Miscellaneous.

Expenses of the Press.

Few of our readers can form any idea of the expenses incident to a well conducted journal. The cost of a daily journal, edited with ability in its various departments is immense, and the improvements introduced within a few years into religious journalism have greatly enhanced its expensiveness. The following summary of the outlay of the London Times, which we take from a correspondent of the Tribune, is both interesting and instructive, and will give some insight into the magnitude of the operations of the daily press.

Mr. F. K. Hunt, himself, we believe, a prominent journalist of London, who has lately published an interesting book on the History of Newspapers, furnishes some statistics as to the number of persons employed and the expenses of a Morning Paper—which, by the way, is everywhere a more costly and laborious thing than an Evening Paper. Mr. Hunt's estimate is briefly as follows: A chief editor, paid 18 guineas a week; sub-editor, 12 guineas; second sub-editor, 10 guineas; foreign sub-editor, 8 guineas; writers (about 4 guineas a day,) £25; sixteen parliamentary reporters, (one at 7 guineas and the others at 5 guineas per week,) £87, 7s.

Each paper of any pretensions must have an establisement at Paris. The head of this who bears the title of Correspondent, is paid 10 guineas a week; a reporter 3 guineas; office expenses and cost of Paris papers, 5 guineas; the agent at Boulogne, who transmits the despatches, has 1 guinea, and the expense of postage is also considerable. A Madrid correspondent is also required at 4 guineas; one at Rome, 4 guineas; Naples or Turin, 3 guineas; Vienna, 3 guineas; Lisbon, 3 guineas; Berlin, 5 guineas; the correspondents at Malta, Alexandria, Athens, Constantinople, Hamburg, China, Singapore, New York, Halifax, Jamaica, and other places where news is to be expected, are paid according to the importance of their posts; the Time's correspondent in New York was, we believe formerly paid £100 per annum for two letters per month. Then there must be a correspondent at every important sea-port in the Kingdom, whose duty it is to forward any news arising there with all possible promptness. A large part of the paper is occupied by reports of doings in the Courts, and the corps of reporters required for this purpose is large and costly. There are nine Courts, in which as many regular reporters are employed at 3 guineas a week, with occasional extra help when work presses; two courts whose reporters have 2 guineas each; four at 1 guinea; seven circuit courts which together cost about £6 a week. There are fourteen police courts which together cost £10 a week, while other penny-a-line reporting costs about £10. Public meetings also have to be reported either by members of the paper's Parliamentary corps, or by reporters specially engaged. A scientific man is also employed to correct the reports of medical evidence and judicial investigations, where chemistry, botany or physiology are involved. The city editor has 7 guineas a week for his daily money articles, two market reporters have each 1 guinea, and seven other markets are reported at a less rate. The salaries paid for the theatrical, musical, and other articles on art, are not given by Mr. Hunt; they are probably comparatively small. The news of the turf is also reported; court intelligence is found in the Court Circular; there must also be a subscription to the Stock Exchange Lists, to Lloyd's and the Jerusalem Coffee House; Hansard's Debates, Acts of Parliament, Votes of the House, and other parliamentary papers, the Coal Market List, the Packet List and the London Gazette must also be subscribed for. A great number of foreign, colonial and provincial papers must also be had, either by exchange or subscription, amounting say to 150 a day. These are read and their news made up by the sub-editors. The paper must also have friends who will bring in news from the various government offices. The news at the clubs, especially the Reform and the Carlton must also be had.

The expense of sending reporters and correspondents to the places whence they are to forward news, and of getting their despatches is also heavy, sometimes a special railway engine being employed. Railway parcels of this sort cost from £5 to £7 a week. The overland mail costs some £4,000 a year, but by sharing among four papers, it is reduced to £20 a week each. The electric telegraph is expensive; but though the charges are high, it is not so costly as in America for the reason that it is less used. The expenses of the printing and publication offices also make a serious item.

The printing employs some sixty persons; a "printer" or foreman, weekly wages £5 to £7; assistants £3 10s. to £4; maker-up of advertisements £3 10s., to £4; three proof readers £3 each, with three assistants (boys) at £1 to £1 10s.; forty-five or fifty compositors £2 10s. to £3. There are also eight or ten "grass" hands or as they are called in this country "subs," who take the places of regular compositors when they are absent. The foreman also employs five or six men after the composition is closed, to help put the paper to press; these men earn from £3 10s. to £4. In the machine rooms are employed a machinist and assistant machinist, a chief engineer and assistant, sixteen men and boys to feed the machine and take out the papers, and one man to wet down the sheets. The publisher is paid 5 guineas a week and has an assistant and four or five errand boys. There are also a secretary, cashier and accountant; three advertisement clerks, a night porter, a day porter and errand boy. The aggregate weekly expenses Mr. Hunt sets down thus:—

Editing, writing, and reporting a double daily paper during the session of parliament	£200
Foreign and local correspondence,	100
Printing, machining, publishing, and general expenses of double paper, with occasional second and third editions, and an evening edition three days a week,	200
Total,	£500

A New Island.—The Lake Superior Journal notices a strange phenomenon which was seen at Two Heat River, 70 miles above the Sault, on the 18th ult. A slight agitation of the water of Lake Superior was noticed, and very soon the land rose out of the water, forming an island of about 240 feet in circumference, and some six feet high. The beach also rose some 12 feet, looking like a hillock of sand. The water was only about five feet deep where the island was formed, and a boat had just passed over it. A few rods from the beach a depression of ground took place at the same time of the upheaving of the island. No noise took place.

Reminiscence of Daniel Webster.

The clerk of the Court of Common Pleas for the county of Hillsborough, New Hampshire, resigned his office in January, 1805. Mr. Webster's father was one of the judges of this court; and his colleagues from regard for him, tendered his son the vacant clerkship. It was what Judge Webster had long desired. The office was worth $1,500 per annum, which was in those days, and in that neighborhood, a competency; or rather absolute wealth. Mr. Webster himself considered it a great prize, and was eager to accept it. He weighed the question in his mind. On the one side he saw immediate comfort; on the other, at the best, a doubtful struggle. By its acceptance, he made sure his own good condition, and what was nearer to his heart, that of his family. By its refusal he condemned both himself and them to an uncertain, and probably harrassing future. Whatever aspirations he might have cherished of professional distinction, he was willing cheerfully to relinquish, to promote the immediate welfare of those he held most dear.

But Mr. Gore peromptorily and vehemently interposed his dissent. He urged every argument against the purpose. He exposed its absurdity and its consequence. He appealed to the ambition of his pupil; once a clerk, he said, he always would be a clerk—there would be no step upward. He attacked him, too, on the side of his family affection; telling him that he would be far more able to gratify his friends from his professional labors than in the clerkship. "Go on," he said, "and finish your studies; you are poor enough, but there are greater evils than poverty; live on no man's favor; what bread you do eat, let it be the bread of independence, pursue your profession; make yourself useful to your friends, and a little formidable to your eaemies, and you have nothing to fear."

Diverted from his design by arguments like these, it still remained to Mr. Webster to acquaint his father with his determination, and satisfy him of its propriety. He felt this would be no easy task, as his father had set his heart upon the office; but he determined to go home immediately, and give him in full the reasons for his conduct.

It was mid winter, and he looked around for a country sleigh—for stage-coaches at that time were things unknown in the center of New Hampshire—and finding one that had come down to market, he took passage therein, and in two or three days was set down at his father's door. (The same journey is now made in four hours by steam.) It was evening when he arrived. I have heard him tell the story of the interview. His father was sitting before the fire, and received him with manifest joy. He looked feebler than he had ever appeared, but his countenance lighted up on seeing his clerk stand before him in good health and spirits. He lost no time in alluding to the great appointment—said how spontaneous it had been made—how kindly the chief justice proposed it, with what unanimity all assented, &c. During this speech, it can be well imagined how embarrassed Mr. Webster felt, compelled, as he thought, from a conviction of duty, to disappoint his father's sanguine expectations. Nevertheless, he commanded his countenance and his voice so as to reply in a sufficiently assured manner. He spoke gaily about the office; expressed his great obligation to their honors, and his intention to write them a most respectful letter; if he should have consented to record anybody's judgments, he should have been proud to have recorded their honors', &c., &c. He proceeded in this strain, till his father exhibited signs of amazement, it having occurred to him, finally, that his son might all the while be serious—"Do you intend to decline this office?" he said at length. "Most certainly," replied his son, "I cannot think of doing otherwise. I mean to use my tongue in the courts, not my pen; to be an actor, not a register of other men's actions."

For a moment Judge Webster appeared angry. He rocked his chair slightly, a flash went over his eye, softened by age, but even then black as jet, but it disappeared immediately, and his countenance regained its usual serenity. Parental love and partiality could not after all but have been gratified with the son's devotion to an honorable and distinguished profession, and seeming confidence of success in it. "Well, my son," said Judge Webster, finally, "Your mother always said that you would come to something or nothing, she was not sure which. I think you are now about settling that doubt for her." The judge never afterward spoke to his son on the subject.

American Tea

The tea grown here turns out far more highly and deliciously flavored than that imported, being in all respects like that drank by the wealthy in China, the grand differeuce between the American grown and the imported, being in the loss of flavor occasioned by the sea voyage. Latitude thirty-four north, in Alabama, Georgia, and North Carolina proves better suited for the cultivation of the plant then any other region. Dr. Davis of South Carolina, who originated the experiment, is already realizing handsomely by the sale of his young trees, which are eagerly bought up at any price by Southern agriculturalists.

There are persons yet living who can recollect when the Cotton plnt was only seen in flower-pots in which it was cultivated on account of its lovely blossom; one of the prettiest flowers in the calender of Horticulture. Observing men in the South who know the history of the cotton raising business of this country are generally of opinion that tea growing is about to become quite as important to us, in even less time than it has taken us to become the greatest cotton producing country in the world. The character of soil and climate adapted to the growth of the tea plant, are not such as to make it interfere at all with the production of cotton; tea lands and cotton lands—those which produce these plants best, being as different in all their attributes as they well can be.

Standard for Saxony Sheep.

BY THOMAS REED.

Perfection should be the aim of all; and as the Saxony sheep have been brought to the highest state of perfection, as producers of extra fine wool, it is my desire to make the description so plain that a young wool-grower, who observes these rules, in buying or selecting for breeding, will soon have a good flock.

First comes the description of a pure blood Saxon buck. He should be of a medium size, (and I consider a medium sized buck to be 3 feet 9 inches from the nose to the root of the tail,) around the body 3 feet 2; around the flank 3 feet 6; from the breast to the hip 2 feet 6; in height 2 feet 3; he should be a little longer than a Merino, and uot so heavily built. The back almost straight; broad over the kidneys; body round; the neck starting almost level with the tops of the shoulders; tapering and becoming round towards the head. The head small and neatly set on; no loose skin on the upper part of the neck, or a very little; the hoofs short and pointed; well quartered, strong, active and spirited; his eye bright; pleasant countenance and tame; the skin smooth and healthy looking. When walking with his side next to you, he should look finished and gay. He should look and feel woolly, not stiff or hard, but soft. The same rules should be observed in selecting ewes, only they are a size smaller.

The next comes the description of his wool: Fine wool on his forehead; wool on his crown, fine, short; downy looking wool on his cheeks; the under part of the neck as fine as possible, and crimped. The wool on the body to be as even as possible all over, and should be crimped 24 to 28 crimps to the inch; the crimps should run plain and evenly across the sample, and up to the top, resembling crape. It should be fine, soft, thick set or compact on the sheep; should be so that it will stand strait out, showing small strands or divisions on the surface of the fleece; the belly well covered with fine wool; the hip wool soft and crimped. The wool should be a clear white or cream color; moderately yolkey, and the surface ef the fleece a little dark. There is a very good kind of wool, that is very fine and close, in which you cannot trace the crimps—you must decide by the smallness of fibre. The fleece when shorn, its felting properties should keep it united; when spread, resembling a spider's web; it should be soft and easy rolled; the length of wool after it is washed and shorn, is from 1½ to 2 inches.

When a young wool grower goes to select he should keep the above described sheep or some other model sheep before his mind; it would help him, to have precisely one-fourth of an inch marked on his thumb nail, to lay the sample on and count, and if they count six or seven crimps in that space they are very good. You should cut the samples with scissors, for pulling them injures the wool and the sheep both.

When the wool is well crimped it is superb. Sheep that are soaked and washed under a waterfall until the wool is pure and clean, will average 2½ lbs. per head—if washed in the old way, they will average 3 lbs. You can have your sheep exquisitely fine, or fine and heavy fleeced, just as you select them to breed from. Then why not breed an American sheep equal to any in the world, or one that will suit our notions?

Remember, "like begets like." Be careful to guard against the following faults:—Coarse, hairy faces; coarse hairs or uncrimped wool on the under part of the neck; stringy on the top of the shoulders; bareness of the belly; coarse hip wool; and coarse hairs on the inside of the thighs; the skin pale or covered with spots; slab-sided, poor on reasonable keeping; sunk, in the neck; a little coarse; low on the side.

In conclusion, try to have your sheep with as many of the good marks as possible, and very few of the bad ones. Annually select, fatten, and sell faulty sheep to the butcher. By so doing, you will have the profit and pleasure of having a fine and beautiful flock.

The Potato Transplanted.

The public are indebted to Mr. E. H. Derby, of Salem, for some interesting experiments in the cultivation of this valuable esculent. His first experiment was to plant potatoes in hot-bed on the 1st of April, from which he took plants twelve inches in height on the 24th of the same month. These plants, like those of the lettuce or cabbage, he set out in drills, about nine inches apart, and from them obtained potatoes for the use of his family on the 24th of June. The potatoes from which these plants were taken, were as fair at the time of the separation, as when put in the ground; and this circumstance appears to have suggested to him the inquiry, whether several sets of plants might not be obtained from the same seed.

He tried a second experiment, and obtained four different sets of vines from the same potatoes, the first May 7th, the second May 21st, the third June 5th, and the fourth June 30th; and from each he raised a crop; from the last in October. He thinks that as many as six different crops may be obtained in this way from the same potatoes in one season. He separates the plants from the parent stock as soon as they are sufficiently rooted it the soil to derive their support from thence.

We have heard of raising the potato by planting the eyes; and this gentleman reports a very fine crop raised in this manner; also another raised from the sprouts. But we believe that his method of raising them from plants, transferred from the hot-bed to the well-prepared soil, posesses great advantages where early new potatoes are desired, and when potatoes are scarce and high. It is worthy of the consideration of cultivators.

Cow-Milking Machine.—A correspondent of the N. Y. Tribune in his notice of the Agricultural Fair at Albany, says:—Another invention of very great use, and little or no damage, is a simple contrivance for milking cows. The milking of his cows has been to the dairyman the branch of his business which cost him most time, labor and embarrassment. This contrivance gets rid of all the labor, and spares nine-tenths of the time. It consists of a little India-rubber bag through the bottom of which passes a small silver tube about two inches long; part of this is inside the bag and part outside. The bag is turned up on the cow's teat, and the top of the tube introduced to the milk passage. The mouth of the bag gently presses the teat, and by means of a small piston a vacuum is effected in the tube, the milk consequently rushes out and flows on in four uninterrupted streams, until the cow is milked dry, which occupies, it is said, no more then four or five minutes. It is one of the most simple and singular contrivances. The owner exhibited a great many certificates attesting not alone its utility but its safety to the animal."

Rain and Heat in the United States.

The last Patent Office report contains meteorological tables and statistics, by which we learn the mean annual depth of rain at various places in the United States, as well as the mean annual temperature. The greatest depth of rain falls at Fort Monroe, Virginia, where it is 52.53 inches, the least at the St. Louis Arsenal, Missouri, where it is 24.12 inches, or less than half. At Fort Hamilton, New York, the depth is 45.71, and at West Point, 48.70. As a general rule, the least rain falls in the Western States, and the most on the Atlantic seacoast, and the eastern side of mountain ranges. At New Orleans, however, and other points near the Gulf of Mexico, the fall is heavy; it being 51.85 at New Orleans. The fall at Boston and Baltimore is about equal, being 39.23 at the former place, and 39.90 at the latter. Through Michigan and Missouri it ranges at about 30.00, but, as we go more south it rises, and in Arkansas averages 35.00. At Fort Constitution, in New Hampshire, the depth is 28.85, the lowest on the Atlantic sea-board. At Key West, Florida, the fall is comparatively slight also, being but 31.39. At Charleston, South Carolina, it is 33.89; at Washington, D. C., 34.62; and from that place it steadily increases as it goes north, till it reaches West Point, where it begins to decline.

The mean annual of the cities of the United States exhibites somewhat different results. The most southern ports, of course, are the hottest; the sea-ports, in the same latitude, are cooler than inland towns. The hottest city appears to be Jackson, Mississippi, where the average temperature is 65.64. of Fahrenheit; the coolest is the little town of Penn Yan, in New-York, which is 45.46. The tables do not include Texas, however, in the South or Maine, New Hampshire, or Vermont, in the North. Cambridge, Massachusetts, is a comparatively cool town, the average temparature being 47.48; whilst that of Philadelphia is 52.57. New Haven, Connecticut, is 49.00; Newark, New Jersey, 50.89; Louisville, Kentucky, 53.08; and Fort Madison, Iowa, 49.62. These, be it remembered, are the average temperatures. Some of the towns mentioned above as comperatively hot, have summers unusually cool for their location; while others, with a low average temparature, are excessively sultry in July and August.

An Arab Entertainment.

A large wooden bowl, some two feet in diameter, and full of boiled rice, was placed in the middle of the street; a crowd of Arabs immediately squatted round, all plunging in their hands at once, and licking their fingers with monstrous delight. The mess vanished rapidly, every one who passed was invited to partake, and some good-natured fellows seized an old blind man and threw him grinning with delight over the heads of those who surrounded tho basin, in order that he might get a handful; women were stopped, and, as they could not eat at once on account of their veils, had their hands filled; one soon contrived to swallow her portion, and I saw her go away wiping her fingers against the wall; children, while on the shoulders of others came for their portion. All this was the work of about three minutes, when the crowd began to disperse. One man, however, probably a late comer, snatched up the bowl, under pretence of washing it from a water-skin, on a camel, hard by, and began to scrape it round and round, and lick his fingers wtth delight. Presently a couple of women joined him, and they squatted down round it, poured more water in, swilled the sides, and washed down the remaining grains of rice which they scooped up and devoured. When these had done, yet another hungry one appeared, and seizing the bowl, rubbed it as if he wanted to melt the sides, poured in a little water, rubbed again, and succeeded in producing a pale fluid. Then he took up the enormous vessel in his two hands, and seemed to enjoy the draught extremely. I afterwards learned that this was a gift to the poor on the occasion either of a marriage, a circumcision, or a death.—[Two Years in a Levantine Family.

Breaking Rocks with Fire.—I believe it is not generally known that large boulders may be easily broken with fire. I have broken many that were on my land in the following manner:—If the rock is embedded in the earth, remove the earth around it and with a large lever raise one side of it a little, and put small stones underneath, so that when it cracks, it will separate of itself. Then, make a narrow fire across it, and in a short time it will crack, so that, with an iron bar and a small iron wedge or two, it may easily be separated. If scales start on it before it cracks, they must be removed, which can be done with a pair of tongs. If it does not break readily, build the fire across in another direction. In this manner, a man will break a dozen large boulders in a day.

First Towns in America.—The National Era relates the following curious facts, which will be news to some of our readers:—"It will seem curious, to those who are not aware of the fact, that the first towns built by Europeans, upon the American continent, were St. Augustine, in East Florida, and Santa Fe, the capital of New Mexico. The river Gila was explored before the Mississippi was known, and gold was sought in California long ere the first white man had endeavored to find a home on the shores of New England. There are, doubtless, trees standing within the fallen buildings of ancient Panama, that had commenced to grow when the sites of Boston and New York were covered with the primeval wilderness.

A Self-Acting Saw-Mill.—The St. Louis Republican gives an account of a saw mill constructed on a new and singular principle. The inventor is Mr. Amos Jackson of Potowatamic county, Iowa. The mill derives its power from the weight of the log to be sawed. The ways on which the carriage travels are fixed on bearings that enter into the frame, the opposite ends are provided with large segments of a cog-wheel working into a series of cog-wheels and pinions; thus when the log is pushed forward to the saw, its weight is brought to act with great force through the segments of a shaft, having several intermediate gearings to increase the speed sufficiently for driving the crank shaft. The price of these mills is said to be light compared with others, and they can be attached to wheels for traveling through the country.

A Curious Case.—A letter dated at Mansfield, August 10th, says: While Mr. Simeon W. Cummings, of this town, was laboring in the field a few days ago, he felt something hard pass from the inside of his nose into his mouth, which he immediately spit out, and upon examination it proved to be a brass button, about half an inch in diameter. His parents and others well recollect the time when he got it up his nose; it was in the month of August, 1833, he then being only four years old. From that time forward it caused him no tronble until last winter, when he had a fall which jarred his head considerably, and, as he thinks, partly dislodged the button and was the ultimate cause of its finding its way out, after being a tenant of his nose for about seventeen years. The button is covered with a kind of bony substance which gives it a rough, ragged appearance. It has been carefully preserved and can be examined by any that feel disposed to doubt the correctness of the above statement.

General Washington's Spectacles.—We were not a little surprised, a day or two since, says the Detroit Advertiser, to learn that the spectacles worn by Gen. Washington throughout the Revolutionary war, are now in possession of an aged and highly respectable lady in this city, by the name of Marsh. One of her relatives, long since dead, received them in exchange from the hand of Washington himself, for a pair furnished at the time, and they have since come into the possession of the lady referred to by regular descent. They are of heavy silver frame with very large round glasses, and apparently constructed after the style we have been accustomed to see in the books upon the nose of Red Riding Hood's grandmother. The worthy owner of them prefers their use to that of any other, no matter how extravagant or costly may be their finish, and we do not wonder at it.

An Itdia Rubber Flute.—We yesterday inspected says the N. Y. Tribune, a new application of the thousand uses of India Rubber—nothing less than an eight-keyed flute of the most elegant finish and tone. It was made by Mr. Badger, 181 Broadway, expressly for Mr. Goodyear, the well-known India-rubber manufacturer. The material of which the flute is composed, has been chemically prepared, and takes as fine a polish as tortoise-shell, which it strongly resembles. A musical friend of ours, having tested its tone pronounces it fully equal to those made of wood and ivory, while it is more durable and cannot be cracked or in any way effected by the weather. Mr. Badger's next production will be a Bœhm flute of the richest mechanism, which he indends to exhibit at the next Fair of the American Institute.

Plowing in Corn for Manure.—When sown broadcast, even if it has reached a hight of six or eight feet, this is easily done by attaching one end of an ox chain to the clevis of the plow, and the other to the beam where the coulter intercepts it, throwing the bight or double part of the chain, into the furrow at the right. As this is dragged along the stocks will be thrown down and covered by the furrow. To finish up the work, and cover any straggling leaves or tops, attach a light halter chain to the standard of the plow, with a three-pound weight at the dragging end, which throw into the furrow. This will effectually cover up all the crop left unburied by the plow. [N. Y. Farmer.

Variety.

The invention of the piano-forte is ascribed to a German, named Schroder, who lived at the beginning of the last century; but it was first introduced into England in 1766, by Zumpe, by whom it was greatly improved. Within the present century, this instrument has received many useful and valuable improvements, so that it may be now fairly regarded as, next to the organ, the noblest and most elegant instrument in the whole compass of musical practice.

It is estimated that there are now in the United States 10,000 daguerreotypists, a[illegible] 5,000 persons indirectly connected with the art. The amount of materials annually co[illegible]sumed in their operations, is valued at [illegible] millions of dollars. "And," says Billy, "I gub him a piece of advice at the time; says I, 'now, General, we've elected you, I hope you'll take good care of the Coestitution!' Says he, 'I'll try; and I hope you'll take care of yours!'"

Mr. Malcom W. Mearis, one of the assistants of the Marshal in taking the census of Baltimore, had the curiosity, while going through the second ward, to ascertain as near as possible, the number of cats and dogs in the ward. He reports that there are 2,063 cats and 803 dogs.

OUR FOREIGN MISSION.

Farther Extracts from Bro. Wardner's Journal.

April 18th. Saw a tract published by a brother missionary, consisting of the Ten Commandments and a Calendar, headed, "The fixed periods of the Sabbath-day, which is Sunday," and accompanied by no explanation.

19th. Saw a Calendar published by another missionary for 1850, headed in the same way, and accompanied by a translation of the fourth commandment, without comment.

22d. Sent the following note to the author of the tract noticed above.

My Dear Brother:—

A few days since, I chanced to meet with a tract, said to have been published by yourself, containing the Ten Commandments, accompanied by a Calendar, the caption of which (if my memory serves me) was something like the following: "The fixed periods of the Sabbath-day, which is Sunday." Now it is evident, that every Chinaman would understand by this statement, that Sunday is the day enjoined in the Fourth Commandment just preceding. Therefore allow me simply to inquire, whether you intended to give such an impression, or was it done inadvertently?

Yours very truly, N. Wardner.

23d. Saw a notice for a school put up by another missionary, containing several appointments to be met during the week, and some on the le-pa-nyi, which is the Sabbath-day. Towards night, received the following reply to my note.

My Dear Brother:—

I intend the Chinese to understand, that the portions of time pointed out in my calendar appended to my tract, are in perfect accordance with the spirit of the fourth commandment. And now permit me to say, as you know very well the points of difference between yourselves and us, that in my humble opinion it is not at all becoming in you to take other missionaries to task for what they publish and teach. You are at liberty to teach the contrary, if you please; but you have no right to catechise us upon our tracts, as if we were responsible to you for our conduct. To our own Master we stand or fall. If you can persuade the Chinese, that you are right, and we are wrong, you are welcome to do so. It is the great business of us all to preach Jesus and Him crucified to this people, and not to contend with each other on disputed points of doctrine. We could spend our whole time in quarreling with our brethren on predestination, perseverance, baptism, &c., but we did not come here for that purpose. We have more important work, and more of it than we shall ever be able to do. There are enough subjects upon which we agree, without contending about those on which we differ. Assuring you that this frank expression is prompted by no ill feeling,

I am yours very sincerely, * *

On receiving this reply, I immediately called on him, and told him that I was prompted by no desire for controversy in making my inquiries; but as he had taught in his tract what was opposed to his avowed sentiment, and what I supposed he knew was not true as a matter of fact, I felt it my duty to go directly to him with it, thinking that perhaps he might give some explanation that would remove the necessity of supposing that he meant to deceive; for I wished, if possible, to avoid such a conviction. That I had done by him as I wished him to do by me, if ever I should teach any thing [illegible] he thought was untrue, and especia[illegible] seemed to contradict my avowed se[illegible] That I considered that no one cou[illegible] greater reflection upon my religio[illegible] ter, than to treat me as if he thou[illegible] of no use to admonish me when [illegible] that no appeal to truth could have [illegible] ence upon my mind; for it would be equivalent to saying, that he regarded me as a dishonest man. We are commanded not to suffer sin upon our neighbor by neglecting reproof. That if we have aught against our brother, we ought to go and tell him his fault. We then entered into the following conversation:—

I had supposed that you held to the doctrine of a change of the Sabbath from the seventh to the first day of the week.

Ans. That is my sentiment, and I am in the habit of preaching it in my chapel. But I did not think best to mention any thing about it in my tract.

Reply. If the day has been changed, then Sunday is not the seventh day mentioned in the fourth commandment, is it?

Ans. No; I do not hold that it is the seventh of that commandment, but that it is a seventh day, and may be observed consistently with the spirit of that commandment, which, I consider, only binds us to observe a seventh portion of time, and which was the idea I wished to impress upon the minds of the Chinese.

Reply. If that were your object, and is your real sentiment, why did you not say a seventh portion of time, instead of insisting upon a definite day?

Ans. Because I consider it important that some particular day be observed, and it is more convenient to set apart the one that is most generally observed throughout the Christian world.

Reply. The convenience of observing one day above another has nothing to do with the question whether or not the first day is the seventh. You have taught that Sunday is the seventh day of the fourth commandment; and the question is, whether that be a fact, and whether you intended to give that impression; for you very well know, that every Chinaman would understand you to mean so.

Ans. I know they would naturally draw that inference, but it is not my object really to impress that idea upon them; neither did I think best to give them any explanation about it either way, for I do not consider it a matter of any particular importance.

Reply. If you did not intend to teach such doctrine, and do not believe it to be true, as you acknowledge, then you ought to correct it, and make your statement true.

Ans. I have no disposition to make any alteration in my tract. I believe that the spirit of the Sabbath can be observed by keeping the first day, as well as by keeping the seventh.

Reply. I supposed that you held to that sentiment, but that does not prove that two distinct days are one and the same day. The question is not, whether the spirit of the Sabbath can be observed by keeping the first day, but whether the first day is the seventh. I was the more surprised at seeing your tract, from the fact that but a few months ago there was so much sensitiveness manifested by the missionaries of this place, because they had been charged with confounding these two days in the same way; a charge, the justice of which was acknowledged, and several of the leading missionaries acknowledged, in a public document, that it was very blameworthy carelessness. But as to keeping the spirit of God's law independent of the letter, I consider it a very untenable position. I hold that no one can will to do what God's word unqualifiedly forbids, without violating the spirit of that prohibition. For, if such can be the case, then men may murder, steal, commit adultery, and violate every precept of the Decalogue, and still not be guilty of any sin. The sanctification of the seventh day is all that the Sabbath institution consists of, as we learn from Gen. 2: 3. And whoever deliberately secularizes that day, violates both the letter and spirit of the institution, neither of which is done by secularizing any other day of the week. Suppose a Chinaman should hear you preach, that the Sabbath has been changed from the seventh day to Sunday, and then read in your tract that Sunday is the seventh day, how would he reconcile those two statements? Or, in case your tract and Dr. Boone's Catechism, in which a change is advocated, should both fall into the hands of the same individual, would he not regard you as contradicting each other?

Ans. I think he would reconcile my statement with the idea of a change.

Reply. But how could he understand your statement to admit of a change, unless you change to Monday, since you say, distinctly, that Sunday is the seventh day?

Ans. Well, I do not consider it a matter of sufficient importance to contend about. The Baptists are in the habit of teaching that immersion is the only mode of baptism. But I, knowing their sentiment, do not think it proper for me to take them to task for it.

Reply. The two cases are not analogous. The Baptists teach what they profess to believe on that subject; but you have published what you acknowledge you do not believe. Suppose I should publish and circulate a tract, teaching that the Bible allows the worship of images, contrary to my known sentiment; would you consider it improper, or a violation of Christian duty, for you to request an explanation, and exhort me to correct that error? I look upon your case in a similar light; and with my views of Christian duty, I could not consistently withhold. I consider it as much my duty to admonish a Christian brother, when I see him err, as to admonish these Chinese in regard to their errors.

Ans. Well, you can have the satisfaction of knowing that you have discharged your duty to me.

And thus it ended. Our conversation was conducted in perfect good humor, so far as I know, and we parted with the same feeling. Notwithstanding, I returned home with a sad heart, to think that these poor heathen must be taught to treat God's Word with such lightness; and that a missionary brother, who came professing to teach the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth, should thus publish what he acknowledged was not true, and still refuse to correct it. Suppose that, when this brother attempts to admonish the Chinese in regard to their idolatry, they should imitate his example—and we have no reason to expect heathens to be more humble than Christians—and say to him, "As you very well know the points of difference between yourselves and us, in our humble opinion, it is not at all becoming in you to take us to task for what we practice and teach. You are at liberty to teach the contrary, if you wish, but you have no right to catechise us in such matters, as though we were accountable to you for our conduct. To our own Master we stand or fall. If you can persuade the people of other countries to believe that you are right, and we are wrong, you are welcome to do so. There are points enough upon which we agree, without quarreling about those upon which we differ." Would he, because of this, feel that he had wrongfully intruded himself upon them, and that it was his duty to retire from the field? Idolatry is as much the profession of their religious faith, as the keeping of Sunday is his; yet, I presume, he never thought of its being unbecoming in him to ask them why they practice it. If, because a man has professed faith in Christ, it is unbecoming to ask an explanation of his profession and practice, to whom does that injunction apply, "Be ready always to give an answer to every man that asketh you a reason of the hope that is in you, with meekness and fear." The injunction to answer, implies the right to ask.

Thus it appears that there are some who are determined, at all hazards, to teach the Chinese that Sunday is the identical Sabbath of the fourth commandment. These men are bountifully supplied with means, and are zealously prosecuting their work. Brethren, what shall be done?

Bro. Carpenter has lately got a few calendars struck off on sheets, and I am assisting my teacher in preparing a small tract on the Sabbath, to be considered as his, of which I hope to get a few copies struck off soon. But the state of our funds will not admit of our doing much in that line, at present; and it is running quite a risk to do any thing. But we feel that something must be done.

As our congregations have been better than usual for the last few months, we have increased the number of our exercises.

Since my letter was commenced, we have been made to rejoice anew in regard to the family of Bro. C.'s deceased teacher.

As regards the advantage of schools, allow me to state, that the American Episcopalians have received sixteen converts into church fellowship, chiefly within the past year, and nearly all are members of their school.

Since writing the above, I have seen other calendars stuck up in the city, stating that the le-pa-nyi is the ur-se-nyi; and some of them accompanied with the fourth commandment.

We are all enjoying good health at present, and are looking forward with anxious hope to the time when we shall be joined by others of our brethren as laborers in this great field.

For the Sabbath Recorder.

THE HUDSON RIVER.

If you are to take a trip up the Hudson, be sure and take it in the day time; a clear moonlight night would be fine, if you could afford to keep awake. The spring time, "when all nature looks gay," as the poet would say, would be a good season; summer and fall would not be bad. You can step on board of a steamboat, or the cars of the Hudson River Railroad, just as you please. For variety's sake, we took the cars. It was a sultry summer morning. The city atmosphere was oppressive. A thin sheet of cirrus skirted the western sky. Thick fleeces of cumulus, or cloud of day, rolled lazily along the south. It was delightful, on such a morning, to snuff the cool highland breeze, as we darted along the eastern banks of the placid Hudson. The Palisades, or precipices of trap rock, are about the first thing to attract attention. They commence at Fort Lee—the fort to which General Washington retreated when compelled to leave New York Island. From this place up to Piermont, the eastern terminus of the New York and Erie Railroad, they present an almost penpendicular wall of rock, rising abruptly from the water's edge to the height of four or five hundred feet.

In the trip along d, several dark passages in life present themselves in the form of tunnels through projecting crags and rocky spurs. With them, there come creeping over us shades of the past, awakening images of scenes that are cherished in perpetual remembrance by a grateful and prosperous people. The imagination instinctively runs back two hundred and forty-one years, to the time when Henry Hudson, sailing up this river, named by him the Great River of the Mountains, in his "Half Moon," with a boat ahead to sound, found the shore lined with Indian wigwams, instead of splendid country seats, thriving villages, and teeming cities. Instead of the arts and comforts of civilization, he found a people clothed in the "skins of elks and foxes"—a people who "slept in the open air, some on mats of straw sewed together, and some on the leaves of trees." There is, however, one remarkable similarity between the two people. The ancient dwellers in this land trafficked in "wild tobacco, which was strong tasted and good to chew;" and the present inhabitants use a weed which they fancy possesses the same notable qualities.

Yonkers, Dobbs' Ferry, Tarrytown or Greenbush, places first passed on the eastern side, are all renowned in revolutionary story. The latter is the spot where Major Andre was arrested, on his return from West Point, by the inflexible patriots, John Paulding, Isaac Van Wart, and David Williams. Stony Point, Forts Montgomery and Clinton, Peekskill, New Windsor, Newburg, Kingston, and other places scattered along the banks of this river, have connected with them many spirit-stirring reminiscences of the "times that tried men's souls."

Booming cannon announced our approach to West Point, fifty-one miles from New York. From works erected here during the revolutionary struggle, under the direction of French engineers, it became a post of great importance to the Americans, and was much coveted by the British. The treasonable maneuvers of Arnold had for their first object the surrender of this place. It is now the site of the noted Military Academy, established here in 1802, under the patronage of the General Government. The site is a craggy hill, projecting to the middle of the river, compressing it into a narrow channel, across which a chain was stretched, in the time of the war, to prevent vessels from passing. The hill rises from the river in terraces. The first and second are narrow; the third, at the height of 188 feet, spreads out into a plain, about a mile in circumference. On this plain, approachable from the north, are situated the buildings and works. The scenery around seems ill adapted to the object of the school—that of training men to butcher each other scientifically. It is such as to inspire love, reverence, and devotion, instead of hatred, malice, and revenge. It is in the nineteenth century, at such a place as this, that our nation, professing to take the lead of the whole world in political and moral matters, is training up young men, who are to maintain her honor, and secure her peace with all nations, by prowling about, manifesting all the characteristics of a surly mastiff just ready for fight. If the nation should get into a broil, by their or any other instrumentality, and they become successful in "conquering a peace," they are immediately hoisted to posts of honor in national affairs. What a course, leading to fame, is here marked out for the young men of our nation! What a highway to national glory is here cast up!

After arranging affairs and composing yourself on exchanging the cars at Poughkeepsie for a regular "floating palace" of the North River order, you will, very naturally, cast a look back to take a parting view of the disappearing Highlands. Then turn your eye to the north, and there meets your gaze the "shadowy surface" of the Catskills, looming up in the distance like some sullen thunder-cloud, that is soon to drench the earth. You instinctively draw your coat closer about you, and look around to see if every thing is ready for a storm. A similar impression comes over you whenever your eye rests upon it after wandering to other objects; but each time it turns out to be the mountain sketched "in dark relief upon the glowing sky." It stands in grandeur, calm, majestic, solemn, with clouds kissing its highest peaks. As you approach nearer, you discover a white speck, perched like an aerie far up in the sides of the mountain. This is the Mountain House, at the "Pine Orchard," where the fashionable, and lovers of nature, "do congregate;" for it has become a "resort." How fresh and cool the breezes are that come rushing down from the mountain! Thin clouds float over our heads, while down in the south the sky gleams with heat.

What a place for moralizing, contemplating! Is it surprising that all true lovers of nature have found much to admire along the Hudson? Yet just look around you. Some of your fellow-passengers are laboring under a regular attack of ennui;—some are engaged in insipid conversation;—while many a novel-reader is intently poring over the fancied "love and murder" of some crack-brained hero or heroine, indifferent to the grandeur around. The tendency of novel-reading to make its votaries perfectly callous to all impressions of realities, however beautiful or grand, is sufficient of itself to stamp it with the opprobrium which has so justly been attached to it. Now and then, with a somberish gleam of half-conscious intelligence, they look up, seemingly desirous to say something. You are in doubt, however, whether, if expressed, it would be, "How delightful!" or, "John, how long is it to dinner?" All doubts are quickly removed, for the "euphonic clang" of the gong, summoning to dinner, sends an electric thrill through their whole frame, inspiring them with new life and animation. Suppose we too follow the general impulse, and step down into the "Eating Saloon." The sun-light faintly streams in through stained glass. This light, softened and increased by candles and lamps, casts a mellow richness over everything—even what you are about to eat. Take your seat at one of the tables ranged in rows on either side of the saloon. Now then, don't let's be so countryish as to have to be told what to eat, or how to get it. Just look at the "bill of fare," where what is to be had is all honestly written out and priced. Here you find—(now don't stand about definition of terms)—soups—macaroni, vermicelli, &c., one shilling a plate; fish—salmon, &c., two shillings; ice-cream, one shilling, &c. Now, just make your selection, inform the waiter of your decision, and your wants will be very soon supplied, and you can go to work. After having leisurely disposed of what you called for, be sure and make friends with that man seated high upon a "throne of state," to see if some well-filled miscreant does not escape without rendering a just and true account. In approaching him, you will be attended by a very obsequious waiter, not to supply your wants, but to see if you are wanting in truthfulness, or distinctness of recollection in regard to what has transpired at table; if so, to put you in mind of things but dimly remembered. Having made everything straight, you will begin to look for Albany, the place of destination, and soon you will be alongside of her wharves, to be beset by cab-men and hotel runners, and to experience that excitement ever attendant on an entrance to a strange city. SONG OF DEATH.

Shrink not, O Human Spirit,
The Everlasting Arm is strong to save!
Look up, look up, frail Nature, put thy trust
In Him who went down mourning to the dust,
And overcame the grave!
Quickly goes down the sun;
Life's work is almost done;
Fruitless endeavor, hope deferred, and strife!
One little struggle more,
One pang, and then is o'er
All the long, mournful weariness of life.
Kind friends, 't is almost past;
Come now and look your last!
Sweet children, gather near,
And his last blessing hear,
See how he loved you who departeth now!
And with thy trembling step and pallid brow,
O, most beloved one,
Whose breast he leaned upon,
Come, faithful unto death,
Receive his parting breath,
The fluttering spirit panteth to be free,
Hold him not back who speeds to victory!
—The bonds are riven, the struggling soul is free!

Hail, hail, enfranchised spirit!
Thou that the wine-press of the field hast trod!
On, blest Immortal, on, through boundless space,
And stand with thy Redeemer face to face;
And stand before thy God!
Life's weary work is o'er,
Thou art of earth no more:
No more art trameled by the oppressive clay,
But tread'st with winged ease
The high acclivities
Of truths sublime, up Heaven's crystalline way.
Here no bootless quest;
The city's name is Rest;
Here shall no fear appal;
Here love is all in all;
Here shalt thou win thy ardent soul's desire;
Here clothe thee in thy beautiful attire.
Lift, lift thy wond'ring eyes!
Yonder is paradise,
And this fair, shining band,
Are spirits of thy land!
And these that throng to meet thee are thy kin,
Who have awaited thee, redeemed from sin!
—The city's gates unfold—enter, oh! enter in!

LAST HOURS OF MR. JUDSON.

The Baptist Missionary Magazine gives full particulars of the death of Mr. Judson, which occurred at sea, April 12, 1850. It seems that after he went on board, the vessel was delayed, so that instead of getting to sea in twenty-four hours, they were five days in reaching Amherst, and it was six days before the pilot left them. How much was thus lost it is impossible to conjecture.

The delay permitted Mrs. Judson (who would gladly have accompanied her husband, though at the risk of her life, if he had consented,) and Mr. Stillson and Mrs. Stevens, to visit him repeatedly, and administer to his comfort. He bore the fatigue of embarkation well, and on Thursday took more refreshment than for several days previous. This gave hope of a favorable change, but on Friday he was not as well, and his two Burman assistants, Ko En and Ko Sway Doke, disciples of many years' standing, who remained on board till the pilot left the vessel, requested that he might be taken back to Maulmain. They were confident he was near his end, and could not endure the thought of his curial in the ocean; they wanted his grave to be made where they and other disciples could look upon it. But any attempt to do this would have proved fatal, and there was no choice but to fulfill the original purpose, Mr. Stillson reminding the affectionate disciples of the death and unknown burial place of Moses.

On Saturday he was perceptibly weaker. Such was his pain that he said he would willingly die if he could. On Sunday, being more calm and free from pain, he conversed more freely and at length than he had been able to, describing somewhat minutely the causes of his pain. He said that no one could conceive the intensity of his sufferings. Death would have been a glad relief. The idea of death caused no peculiar emotion of ether fear or transport. His mind was so affected by suffering that he could not think or even pray. Nay, he could not think of his wife and family. He had bitter sorrow in parting with them at first; but in Mrs. Judson's subsequent visits, speech had been almost denied him, and when they parted, the day before, perhaps for the last time on earth, it was without a word, and almost without a thought, so entirely had pain absorbed every faculty. Yet he felt he had nothing to complain of. He knew it was the will of God, and therefore right. Alluding to the swelling of his feet, he said, "The natives are frightened when they see this. They regard it as a sure sign of approaching death, but I do not; I have talked with the doctor about this, and have myself remarked at different times the swelling and subsiding. I still feel that there is so much life in me that I shall recover.

On Monday, the 6th, at half past three o'clock, P. M., the pilot, with the two assistants above named, and Moung Shay Moung, of the Amherst church, left the ship. At the request of Dr. Judson, Mr. Ranney wrote to Mrs. J. his opinion of himself, "he went out to sea with a strong feeling that he should recover." But on the same day the violence of his pains returned, and his left side was swollen much, from which he gained partial relief. On Tuesday morning, the Tenasserim coast being yet visible, they enjoyed a fresh and invigorating breeze, but a violent thunder-storm came on, followed by a calm. For a short time Dr. J. suffered less pain, but a hiccough increased upon him. He said, "This hiccough is killing me; can you think of anything to do for it?" He afterwards slept considerably, and took some slight refreshment, but in the afternoon a new symptom appeared, which continued to the last—frequent vomiting, and an inability to retain anything upon his stomach.

During the night and the next day the weather was exceedingly hot. Dr. Judson refused all nourishment and inclined to sleep, probably on account of the laudanum and ether administered. He said he should weary them but little longer. The captain gave several prescriptions without effect, on which he said, "It was of little consequence. I do not wish any one to think I died because all was not done that could be done for me. Medicine is of no use. The disease will take its course." While suffering the acute pain, which invariably preceded vomiting, he said, "Oh that I could die at once, and go immediately into paradise, where there is no pain."

In the evening of Wednesday, as Mr. Ranney was sitting by his bed-side, he said, "I am glad you are here, I do not feel so abandoned. You are my only kindred now—the only one on board that loves Christ, I mean, and it is a great comfort to have one near me who loves Christ." "I hope," said Mr. R., "you feel that Christ is now near, sustaining you." "Oh, yes!" he replied, "It is all right there. I believe he gives me just so much pain and suffering as is necessary to fit me to die—to make me submissive to his will." He spoke of the invigorating influence of the wind, and expressed a fear that they would lose it during the night, which proved true. After midnight there was a dead calm, and a very oppressive atmosphere. At two o'clock his breathing became very difficult, but after vomiting he breathed more freely.

On Thursday morning his eyes had a dull appearance, remained half closed while sleeping, and seemed glassy and death-like. His stomach rejected all refreshment. At ten and twelve o'clock he took some ether, which he said did him good. After vomiting, with the suffering that preceded it, he said, 'Oh, how few there are who suffer such great torment—who die so hard!" During all the night his sufferings increased, so that it was inexpressibly painful to behold his agony—sometimes calling for water, which gave relief only while he was drinking it, to be followed by the pain of ejecting it. At midnight he said the fever had returned. His extremities were cold, his head hot—it was the fever of death. His weakness was such that he now seldom spoke, except to indicate some want, which he more frequently did by signs.

During the forenoon of Friday, the 12th, his countenance was that of a dying man. About noon he showed some aberration of mind, but it was only transient. At three o'clock he said in Burmese to Poonapah, a native servant, "It is done, I am going." Shortly after he made a sign with his hand downward, which was not understood; drawing Mr. Ranney's ear closer to his mouth, he said, convulsively, "Brother Ranney, will you bury me? bury me?—quick! quick!" These words were prompted perhaps by the thought of burial in the sea crossing his mind. Mr. Ranney here being called out for a moment, Dr. Judson spoke to the servant in English and also in Burmese, of Mrs. Judson, bidding him "take care of poor mistress," and at fifteen minutes past four o'clock he breathed his last. "His death," says Mr. Ranney, "was like falling to sleep. Not the movement of a muscle was perceptible, and the moment of the going out of life was indicated only by his ceasing to breathe. A gentle pressure of the hand, growing more and more feeble as life waned, showed the peacefulness of the spirit about to take its homeward flight."

It was first determined to keep the body for burial on Saturday, but they were admonished of the necessity of immediate preparations. A strong plank coffin soon received the body, several buckets of sand were poured in to make it sink, and at eight o'clock P. M., the crew assembled; the larboard port was opened, and in perfect silence, broken only by the voice of the captain, the remains were committed to the deep—in lat. 13 deg. north, lon. 93 east, nine days after their embarkation at Maulmain, and scarcely three days out of sight of the mountains of Burmah.

TRUTH TESTED BY TIME.

The following passage of a letter from Dr. Layard, is worthy of a place by itself, that it may attract the attention which its importance demands:—

"In a religious point of view, there is no doubt that much important information may be expected from a careful investigation of the monuments of Assyria. During my labors, without being able to devote much thought or attention to the subject, I have been continually struck with the curious illustrations of little understood passages in the Bible, which these records afford. In a historical and archæological point of view, I know nothing more interesting and more promising than the examination of the ruins of Assyria. One of the vastest empires that ever existed—the power of whose king extended, at one period, over the greater part of Assyria—whose advance in civilization and knowledge is the theme of ancient historians—disappeared so suddenly from the face of the earth, that it has left scarcely a trace, save its name, behind. Even the names of its kings are not satisfactorily known, and out of the various dynastic lists preserved, we are unable to select one worthy of credit. As to their deeds, we have been in the most profound darkness; and were it not for the record of their strength and greatness which we find in the Scriptures, we should scarcely credit the few traditions which the Greeks have preserved to us. After the lapse of two thousand five hundred years, a mere chance has thrown their history in our way, and we have now their deeds chronicled in writing and in sculpture."

What a Pastor may do with his Pen.—It has often filled us with surprise, that so few of the strong men of the pulpit employ their pens for the press. A pastor sometimes spends weeks in elaborating thought for a sermon which is delivered to a congregation of a few hundreds, and is then thrown into the barrel of old manuscripts. The same thought condensed, and put into a popular form for a newspaper, might reach and influence hundreds of thousands; and with as much hope of its making abiding and saving impressions, perhaps, as when uttered from the pulpit. One of our contributors, who is a veteran pastor, some time since formed the wise purpose of devoting one day of the week to the press; and he has become one of the most widely known and useful of the practical essayists of the world.

DESTINY OF THE WICKED.

We have shown that the wicked must necessarily suffer punishment, from the fact that they have transgressed the divine law, it being absurd to suppose a law without a penalty. We have also seen, that they are not punished in this life according to the extent of their crimes.

III. Our third proposition is, that the penalty of the law is not satisfied by the death of the body.

The Scriptures clearly teach, that there are degrees in punishment. Every one receives "according to that he hath done." God "will render to every man according to his deeds." The disobedient is beaten with few or many stripes, according to the aggravation of his offense. (See 2 Cor. 5: 10. Rom. 2: 6. Luke 12: 47, 48. Compare also Matt. 10: 15.) But if the death of the body is the proper punishment of sin, where are the degrees? An infant, who has committed no actual transgression, is, in that case, punished as much as the hoary-headed sinner. The adult sinner might, however, go out of the world under circumstances of greater suffering. He might have a longer season of sickness; he might suffer more acute pains. Yet this is not always the fact. Sometimes the infant's death is preceded by greater bodily suffering than that of the most hardened offender. So far, therefore, as the death of the body indicates the wrath of God against sin, it would seem that He is sometimes more angry with the infant than with those who have grown old in iniquity—a supposition, which cannot for a moment be admitted. It is true, death is represented as passing upon all men because of sin, (Rom. 5: 12,); and it is evident, from the context, that the Apostle is speaking of bodily death. But as it is contrary to other places in Scripture, and to all known perfections of God, to suppose that He punishes the less guilty with the same severity as He does those who are more so, we must construe the passage so as not to render such a supposition necessary. No doubt the Apostle alludes to infants, when he speaks of "them that had not sinned after the similitude of Adam's transgression," over whom "death reigned nevertheless." But the scope of his argument shows, that the sin for which death passed upon them was not their own actual transgression, but the sin of Adam imputed to them.

IV. If the penalty of the law is not satisfied by the sufferings of this life, nor by the death of the body, it remains to be inflicted after death.

What saith the Scripture on this point? "It is appointed unto men once to die, but after this the judgment." Heb. 9: 27. But will this judgment take place immediately after death? The Scriptures clearly speak of some particular day or period of judgment for the whole of mankind. Acts 17: 31. It must, therefore, be after death has finished its work upon the human race. To suppose that every individual is judged immediately after he passes out of this world, would conflict with what we have already shown concerning the responsibility of man for the consequences or results of his actions. Voltaire's sins were not finished when he died the death of the body. Neither were Paine's, nor Hume's, nor Bolingbroke's Their writings still remain to corrupt mankind. Indeed, every body's influence is felt more or less after his death. How then could he be punished immediately after death, unless he were punished in advance, and before he could, by a clear view of all the consequences flowing from his wickedness, feel his punishment to be just? It is true, God does not need to wait to know what kind of, or how much, punishment would be due to the sinner. His omniscience is sufficient to foresee all the consequences that will flow from a man's acts; and were nothing more necessary than that God should see the justice of the punishment, it might be inflicted as soon as man finishes his career on earth. But it is necessary that the sinner himself should feel the justice of his punishment.

V. If the punishment due to sin cannot be inflicted till death shall have finished its work upon the human race, it will, of course, not be inflicted till after the resurrection.

Here we have a passage of Scripture just to the point. "All that are in the graves shall hear his voice, and shall come forth; they that have done good to the resurrection of life, and they that have done evil to the resurrection of damnation." John 5: 29. This must refer to the literal resurrection which shall take place at the coming of the Lord. On any other interpretation, the term "graves" must refer to the moral condition of those who hear his voice; and if so, the resurrection spoken of must be a moral resurrection. But what moral resurrection can be enjoyed by those who do good? Have they not received the moral resurrection already? Can they do good at all, till they are quickened and raised to newness of life? (Matt. 7: 18.) And in what sense is the state of damnation, to which they that have done evil come, a resurrection? It is, if anything, a deeper state of death. It is a lower descent into the grave of sin. It follows, that the text points out the final reward of those who have spent this life in the fear of God, and the final doom of those who spent their earthly probation in rejection of God and his Son Jesus Christ.

We shall resume the subject.

EDUCATIONAL CONSULTATION AT ALFRED.

Agreeable to a Call published in the Sabbath Recorder, the Educational Committee appointed at the last session of the General Conference, and the Committees appointed by the several Associations, held a meeting at Alfred, N. Y., during the recent anniversary season, to consult about the object of their appointment and the best mode of attaining it. A good deal of time, in the early stage of the meeting, was taken up in considering the relation of the several Committees to each other. When that was disposed of, the question of the desirableness and practicability of immediately establishing a College and Theological Seminary, was brought under discussion. It seemed to be agreed, that the thing was desirable, but that there were reasons to doubt its practicability. Finally, a resolution was passed, "that in order to the ultimate accomplishment of the educational purposes expressed by the last General Conference, the joint Committees of the Conference and the Associations recommend the calling of a mass meeting, which shall be advised to proceed at once to prepare a Constitution for an Education Society, whose duty it shall be to form a temporary Theological Class in view of our immediate wants, and to take the necessary steps to give it efficiency." The Committees then adjourned.

The Mass Meeting above proposed was called to order by Eld. Eli. S. Bailey. Thos. B. Stillman was chosen Chairman, and Wm. C. Kenyon, Secretary. A Committee—consisting of T. B. Brown, W. C. Kenyon, N. V. Hull, J. R. Irish, J. H. Cochran, W. B. Maxson, and T. B. Stillman—was appointed to draft a Constitution for an Education Society. At a subsequent meeting, this Committee made their report, when the following Constitution was adopted, and the officers provided for in it were appointed.

WM. L. CHAPLIN.—This victim of slaveholding cruelty and injustice, was last week bailed at Washington for $6,000, and immediately proceeded, under an escort of officers, with his lawyers and friends, to Rockville, Md. There a great excitement existed, and the magistrates were so unreasonable in their demands, that Mr. Chaplin's counsel concluded to withdraw his application for release on bail, and he was fully committed, on charge of "assault with intent to kill." It is said that the evidence against Mr. Chaplin is very contradictory, and there is little chance of convicting him, if anything like a fair trial is awarded. But he is in the hands of persons educated in a slave-holding community, and it is difficult to say what the result will be.

EXTRACTS FROM A LETTER OF W. H. BLACK.

The following extracts from a letter of Rev. Wm. H. Black, Pastor of the Mill Yard Church, London, to Bro. Thomas B. Stillman, of New York, were read before the Board of the American Sabbath Tract Society, at their meeting in July, and are now furnished us with permission to print in the Recorder.

On the 4th of 5th month, I received from your brother William a list of old books on the Sabbath, which are in your possession, and of such as you chiefly want. My own collection, now deposited in the vestry at Mill Yard, and forming part of a perpetual library which I am founding there, is amply furnished with books on every side of the Sabbath question. It then contained copies of all that you possess, excepting Brabourne's, dated 1632, (of which the only other copy that I know is in the Bodleian Library,) "Edward Stennett's Tracts," and the first American edition of Carlow. I have also all that you are desirous of collecting, excepting Dr. Bound's Second Book, Brabourne's various publications, and F. Bampfield's folio tracts. My catalogue comprehends exact notices of about three hundred publications on the Sabbath, with references to all known copies of the several articles, except those which are most common; the greater part of the references being made to my own collection. The catalogue is, however, far from being complete, as there are names yet standing in it, to which, after twelve years' research, I am unable to attach more than a reference to the authors by whom they are mentioned. In this unfinished state, I am unwilling to have it copied; but I hope, at some future day, to print it, or at least that portion of it which relates to works in favor of the seventh-day Sabbath, which are more numerous than you are aware, and some of them are more interesting than any you have yet seen; for example, Tillam, 1657, containing a notice of our congregation, visited by the Jews soon after their restoration by Cromwell; also, an admirable "Discourse of the Sabbath," by my predecessors, Henry Soursby and Mehetable Smith, 1683; also, Mr. Speaker Thomas Bampfield's own copy of both his own tracts, and those published against him, with his own manuscript notes. We have also two volumes of Cornthwaite's publications, with those of his adversaries, which belonged to himself. I have three copies of Martin Luther's book on the Sabbath, (1538, quarto, black letter,) one of which is intended for you. I have also most of the publications of that valiant champion of the truth Edward Elwall; all of which relate more or less to the Seventh-day Sabbath; but, alas, I am unable yet to trace a copy of his separate publication on that subject, which is mentioned by his biographers. His bones have rested with us at Mill Yard more than a century.

Last Sabbath evening, when we went home from our summer lodgings on the Forest, in Essex, I had the happinesss of finding on the table a book which was sent to me from a bookseller, which, if I had possessed five years ago, would have enabled me to answer your letter of 30th of 11th month, 1845, better than I have yet done. It is a thin quarto, the contents being the same as those of the volume described in your letter, but in a different order:—(1.) E. Stennett's "Royal Law contended for," the second edition, corrected and amended; whereunto is added, "A faithful Testimony against the Teachers of Circumcision and the Legal Ceremonies, who are lately gone into Germany: London, printed in the year 1667." (2.) His tract entitled "The Seventh-day is the Sabbath of the Lord," 1664. The whole is perfect, except that a part of the last leaf in the volume has been torn off. It now appears, that the copy from which you reprinted Stennett's Royal Law is, as I supposed, the second edition, and that the Testimony is not a separate tract, without a title page, but a kind of supplement to it.

I am sorry to inform you that, although a great part of my Scriptural Calendar for 1850 was set up in type before the end of last year, the bad state of my eyes has prevented me from completing it. You have, no doubt, perceived, that I make the Sabbath question a part of Chronological Science; and in this point of view many have acknowledged that we are right. By setting men's judgments right, even apart from religious considerations, no small help to the progress of truth may be expected. I am desirous of promoting the study of Chronology, for this among other reasons; and have collected at Mill Yard a Chronological Library, which affords valuable supplements to the works published separately and expressly on the subject of the Sabbath.

I learn from your brother, that you are exceedingly interested in the biography of Sabbath-keepers; so am I, and I have been collecting, for twelve years past, every thing that can be learned about those in England, for the purpose of compiling a work on the lives and writings of English Sabbath-keeping Christians.

We are thankful to you and your friends for the various publications which, from time to time, you have sent to me; and, as we are desirous of having more, especially of our dear brother Davison's valuable tract, (No. 10 of your series, not forgetting a few copies of it in German and French,) I shall pay £1 on account of the Tract Society to your brother William, and the like sum for the Mission.

I forbear saying anything at present about the state of things at Mill Yard, your brother having been received in communion with us, and being in frequent correspondence with you. I only add a suggestion made by my scribe, who earnestly presses for the reprinting of an article in a recent number of the Recorder, headed "Delaying Obedience." She says that if you do not make it one of your small tracts, she shall be obliged to reprint it at her own expense. Two small tracts recently printed by me shall be sent in our first packet.

I have this day returned to business. Last First-day I baptized five persons at Cranbrook, in Kent. My two months have been pleasantly and not uselessly passed; my health and eyes are better. Salute the brethren in my name, and believe me to be,

My dear brother, yours most faithfully,
W. H. BLACK.

JENNY LIND'S SINGING.

To the Editors of the Sabbath Recorder:—

Soon after leaving you, on Tuesday evening, I found myself wending my way to Castle Garden, to hear the far-famed "Queen of Song," JENNY LIND.

I occupied one of the very best seats in the house—was within twenty feet of Jenny all the while—and had an excellent opportunity to hear her lisping of every word, observe the movement of every muscle, and analyze the philosophy of her voice. I have read many scientific critiques on her singing—technical descriptions of her musical powers—but I have not seen one which has given a satisfactory explanation of the peculiarity of her voice and execution. I find that there is a universal difficulty in approximating to an estimate of her merits. The most general impression, on first hearing her, is disappointment. Every one appears to look for something totally sui generis—a species of singing altogether unique—never heard before—a kind of newly-invented musical instrument, the like no one has ever approached; and when they hear the music that others have sung before, they find nothing very remarkable—nothing but what they found others fully competent to, if not superior on the whole. I have not heard Madame Bishop sing in public, but from a private practicing I listened to, I do not think Jenny has, by any means, so sweet a voice as hers—certainly does not infuse the deep pathos of many public singers; but her excellence consists in her soft low cadences, and her thrilling chirpings. You are surprised at the clearness and softness of her low tones, and then are startled, amazed, by the instantaneous transition to her caroling chirpings in the highest notes of the gammut—unlike anything but a bird. A perfect thrill runs through every fibre of the frame—you find yourself raised from your seat, asking yourself: What is it? What is coming next? The whole assembly is electrified, and all come, spontaneously, to the one conclusion—It has never been done after this fashion before—it cannot be done by any one but Jenny Lind!

This is the great peculiarity and the great charm of her singing. It is Ventriloquism harmonized! That will convey to you a better idea of her singing than any description I can give you. All her low cadences, and all her high thrilling strains, are accomplished by that art. She ought not to sing English, French, or Italian music, but restrict herself to Tyrolesean airs entirely. If she were to confine herself to that style, no one could compete or compare with her. Her "Echo Song" is one of her happiest efforts, as it gives her, in echoing her own notes, one of the finest opportunities to exercise her ventriloquist powers.

Besides, there is another attraction about Jenny Lind. It is her graceful simplicity and lady-like demeanor. In every action before assembled thousands, her bearing is like the most accomplished lady in a private parlor. She does not appear to be before you to exhibit herself, but as if she had come into the presence of the brilliant audience, to greet intimate friends, and to hear something pleasing from them. No person can behold her without experiencing a going-out of heart, involuntarily, to her; and if she does not sing an Italian song with the warmth of a Garcia (Malibran,) or a ballad with the sweetness of Madame Bishop, yet she runs into the finale a cadence of her own, which throws a new charm, completely, into it, and makes you acknowledge, that Jenny has done it. It is Jenny!—and Jenny is the charm, if the song has not been sung so well as others may have done it. These ad libitum embellishments, which she introduces into most of her pieces, inspire the interest in her songs, and stamp her superiority. But, to understand her fully, you must see her as well as hear her; for if it is not a piece in which her ventriloquist powers can be exercised, it is necessary to see her, and that supplies the rest. Not her beauty, for there is not enough of that to atone for what others may accomplish equally well, or perhaps better; but Jenny's sweet, lady-like deportment, wins on you so much, that when you see her, you are so much hers that you are not your own.

This is my reading of Jenny Lind—the "Swedish Nightingale;" not an inappropriate title; but if I were called upon to designate her by a term expressive or characteristic of her powers, I should style her the Warbling Ventriloquist!—a reading based on an impartial, a common sense analysis. She is, certainly, a phenomenon—a riddle, I was almost going to say—which puzzles all who hear her; for, however much the audience is delighted, there is still, in the great majority, an evident sense of disappointment. The secret of this disappointment is, that her singing does not excite the feelings. It startles the intellect, but leaves the feelings untouched—her voice is not sufficiently mellifluous and pathethic to stir the inner lute strings. The grandeur of vivid lightning excites our admiration, but it does not touch the heart. So with Jenny's singing. The mass of mankind are influenced by their feelings—moved by tender touches. However hardened, still they may be reached by appeals to their gentler nature—by the kindlier woings struck on nature's harp. Jenny does not make the slightest attempt of the kind. Indeed there is no such thing as stage-trick, clap-trap, or acting, about her; but while her singing does not affect the feelings, as we desire and expect it to do, her lovely character and sweet bearing open wide the portals of the heart, and there she sits enthroned on our affections, nolens volens.

That is the source of the enthusiasm on beholding her performances, if performances they can be called. In a word, you cannot see and hear Jenny Lind without being enraptured. She is "nothin' else" than Jenny Lind! And when you see her and hear her, you will find a world of meaning in that name. Maugre the performance, you cannot help applauding her; which applause she receives so gracefully—so beautifully—that after the most prolonged bursts of ecstacy, you do not feel satisfied that you have given her her full deserts.

While awaiting the hour for the commencement of the Concert, and almost overwhelmed by an oppressive sense of the imposing scene before you—the immense assembly of persons within those spacious walls—not less than seven thousand (I should judge more) of human beings in one congregated mass—a sea of heads, piled upon each other, up to the dome—I mentally exclaimed: How potent is Song, that can interest, night after night, such multitudes—sway such incongruous thousands! And then the wish entered my heart, that one possessed of such powers, would sing the Songs of Salvation, and draw such thoughtless, wayard throngs to the foot of the Cross! But after hearing her, I found, electrifying as her tones are, they would not echo the groans of Calvary, they would not pierce the side nor the heart of sinners, to make them forget what manner of persons they have been in times past, and to live the life of the righteous in time to come. In the transformation of the heart, there would have to be a transformation of the style in Jenny's singing, or it would fall dead upon the devotions of those whose lips have been touched with coals from off the altar. As a legitimate curiosity to hear a musical phenomenon, and particularly when associated with a being of so much benevolence as to give away ten thousand dollars at one time to charitable purposes—one whose whole life has been marked by acts of kindness and goodness—it is almost irresistible; you cannot withstand going to hear Jenny Lind. But once is enough to gratify the curiosity of those who delight in the solemn sounds of the sanctuary, and whose souls are only wafted heavenward by the Songs of Zion.

Yours, W. M. F.

JENNY LIND'S CONCERTS AND BENEFACTIONS.

Jenny Lind has given six concerts at Castle Garden in New York, which have been attended by audiences ranging from six to eight thousand, and the proceeds of which have been from twenty to thirty thousand dollars each. Of the general character of these concerts, and especially of Miss Lind's style of singing, the above article of our correspondent "W. M. F.," gives a very full and correct account. Of the use which Miss Lind will make of the money which is now flowing so freely into her hands, she has already given an earnest. Her part of the proceeds of the first concert, amounting to ten thousand dollars, she made over at once to the various charities of the city of New York—to the Fire Department Fund $3000, to the Musical Fund Society $2000, and $500 each to the Home for the Friendless, the Society for the Relief of Indigent Females, the Dramatic Fund Association, the Home for Colored and Aged Persons, the Lying-in Asylum for Destitute Females, the N. Y. Orphan Asylum, the Protestant Hall Orphan Asylum, the Roman Catholic Half-Orphan Asylum, and the Old Ladies' Asylum. It is also stated, upon good authority, that Miss Lind is cherishing the most noble plans for future usefulness—that she [illegible]signs to devote the avails of her servic[illegible] America to the establishment of [illegible] for the Christian Education of poor child[illegible] in her own country, and to take the ge[illegible] management of the institution herself. [illegible] who consider the chaste and refining [illegible]ter of the amusement furnished at the Lind Concerts, and the praiseworthy [illegible] which is to be made of no [illegible]nsiderable portion of their proceeds, will be slow to complain of the expenditure which they involve.

AN OLD CHURCH AND PERMANENT MINISTRY.—The Independent says that "Rev. Mr. Wines has received and accepted a unanimous and cordial invitation to become pastor of the Presbyterian church at East Hampton, L. I., the scene of Dr. Beecher's earliest labors. It is a remarkable fact, that there never has been any other church in the place; and until within two years the temporalities of the church have been managed by the trustees of the town, as representing one and the same people throughout. The church was founded in 1649. The first three pastors labored for a period of 152 years; Dr. Beecher was the fourth, and was installed in 1799.

THE DEAD OF 1850.—Already a large number of persons of note have passed away since 1850 commenced, of whom the following are a part:—

John C. Calhoun, S. Margaret Fuller, Sargeant S. Prentiss, Sir Robt. Peel, Mathew L. Davis, William Wordsworth, Gen. Zachary Taylor, President Soyer, Com. Jones, Augustus Neander, Adam Ramage, Heinrich Zchokke, Emperor of China, Adam Ochlenschlaeger, Duke of Cambridge, D. M. Moir, Louis Phillippe, Berzelius, Franklin H. Elmore, Lord Godolphin, Daniel P. King, Sir Francis Jeffrey, Jacob Hays, Nicholas Lenau, Brig. Gen. Mason, M. Balzac, J. Newland Maffit, Rev. Adoniram Judson.

LITERARY HONOR DECLINED.—Several years ago, Union College conferred the degree of D. D. on Rev. Albert Barnes of Philadelphia—an honor which he promptly declined, on the ground that he doubted the propriety of such distinctions among ministers of the gospel. At the recent commencement of Middlebury College, the honorary degree of LL. D. was conferred on Mr. Barnes, and this also he respectfully declines for the same reason. The rejection of these titles has conferred on him more honor than the wearing of them ever could.

REVIVAL INTELLIGENCE.—The Religious Herald says that on the first Sunday in this month, twenty-five persons were received into the First Congregational Church in Milford, Conn., under the pastoral care of Rev. Jonathan Brace—the fruits of a late precious work of revival among that people. We see it stated, also, that among the Methodists on Leon Circuit, Florida, one hundred whites and a large number of colored persons have been added to the church. It is supposed that, at the next annual conference in that State, the largest increase will be reported ever known within its bounds.

PAPAL AND ROMISH DOINGS.—The Pope has "with great joy" granted the prayer of the Bishop and Clergy of Rimini, that they may be permitted, as a public and striking mark of their eminent piety and gratitude, to ornament with a crown of gold the image of the "Mother of Mercies, which has become celebrated within the last two months throughout the whole country by the miraculous movement of its eyes to the great advantage of the faithful." The Roman Post Office has recommended the rigorous exclusion of such foreign newspapers as express opinions unfavorable to the Papal Court or any of the corrupt branches of the administration.

DICTIONARIES IN THE SCHOOLS OF MASSACHUSETTS.—The Springfield Republican says that the Act of the Legislature, giving a copy of Webster's quarto or Worcester's octavo Dictionary, to each School District, which will provide a suitable place for keeping it, took effect the first of August. During that month five hundred and twenty copies of Webster were ordered by the Districts, and eighteen copies of Worcester. Randolph is the only town that has taken Worcester exclusively, and out of fifty-four towns and cities, forty-nine, including Boston and Cambridge, take Webster. The sales of Webster, through the booksellers, have been much larger the present year than any previous time—showing that the more extensively the work is known, the more highly it is appreciated.

"HATH A JEW FEELINGS?"—It is said that not long ago a deputation waited on Sir Moses Montefiore to ask his assistance in their efforts to build a church. "You know my religious opinions," replied the excellent Jew; "I cannot give you money to build a church—there are five hundred guineas for you to do what you like with."

FAIR OF THE AMERICAN INSTITUTE.—The Twenty-third Annual Fair of the American Institute will open to the public at Castle Garden on the 1st proximo. It is believed that this Exhibition will far surpass those of previous years, not only in the number of articles offered, but in important and useful improvements in the Machanic Arts. The applications commenced at an uncommonly early period, and have continued with little diminution to the present day. The Fair will continue for three weeks—commencing Tuesday, Oct. 1. The preceding Monday will be appropriated for arranging the contributions. Vegetables, fruits and flowers, for the Horticultural Department, must be entered before noon of that day. The usual Opening Address will be delivered on Tuesday evening. On Wednesday the steam-engine with moving machinery will be in oper[illegible]ion, and continue until the close of the Fair. [illegible]e Anniversary Address will be delivered [illegible]e Broadway Tabernacle on the evening [illegible]Vednesday, 9th. The Plowing and Spad[illegible]Matches, Regattas, Fireworks, etc. will [illegible] in regular rotation, and add materially [illegible] interest of the occasion. The Cattle [illegible] is reserved for the fourth, fifth and [illegible]ays of the last week.

Ammin Bey, the Turkish Envoy, visited the Senate at Washington last week, and in the course of the day of his visit an appropriation of $10,000 was inserted in the bill under consideration, to defray the personal expenses of the Envoy during his residence and travels in the United States—a mark of respect towards the Sovereign of Turkey, and to the motives which prompted this mission.

The Ohio Cultivator says that Mr. J. C. Davis, near Milford, 16 miles from Cincinnati, has a peach orchard of 100 acres, containing 14,000 trees, of 30 or 40 varieties, and expects his sales this year to reach 15,000 bushels. The trees were carried from New Jersey three years ago, and are healthy and thriving.

Mr. Price, a black man of great intlligence, and member of the Jamaica House of Assembly, has been appointed a magistrate. In consequence of this appointment, the Hon. W. D. Turner, custos of St Catharine, has resigned his commission.

Rev. ASA MAHAN has resigned the Presidency of Oberlin (Ohio) College. It is understood that he will accept the Presidency of the National University, a new Institution being established near Cleveland, Ohio.

The Roman Catholic convent at New-Iberia, La. was totally destroyed by fire on the 27th ult. It had just been prepared for the reception of pupils.

The sum necessary for carrying out the project of a Seaman's Home in New-Bedford, has been obtained.

Mr. Stephenson, the engineer, has been offered and declined the honor of knighthood.

General Intelligence.

PROCEEDINGS IN CONGRESS LAST WEEK.

IN SENATE. SECOND-DAY, Sept. 16.

Mr. Dickinson, from the Finance Committee, reported the Civil and Diplomatic Appropriation Bill, with various amendments, and the bill was made the special order for Fourth-day next.

Mr. Fremont introduced a bill for the settlement of Private Land Claims in California.

Mr. Pratt introduced a bill to prevent the enticing of slaves from their masters.

The bill to preserve peace with the Indian tribes in California, was passed.

The bill to suppress the Slave Trade in the District of Columbia, was read a third time. The question being stated upon its passage. Mr. Benton addressed the Senate. He was replied to by Messrs. Clay, Foot, and Dickinson; after which the bill passed by a vote of 33 to 19.

The Bounty Land Bill was then taken up A pending amendment, making provision for the satisfaction of Virginia Revolution Bounty Land Warrants, was debated and rejected. An amendment, extending the benefits of the bill to the Navy and Marines who served on the Coast of Florida during the Seminole War, and in the Gulf during the War with Mexico, after a long debate, was agreed to.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

A bill was passed, after pretty warm opposition from "the chivalry," that the proper officers of the Government, in adjudicating claims for half-pay to Revolutionary Officers of Virginia, under the third section of the act of '32, shall in no case allow commutation and interest, in lieu of half-pay.

A good deal of time was spent, to no great profit, in discussing the printing question. The subject was finally referred to a select committee.

Mr. Stevens, of Pa., gave notice of his intention to introduce a bill to alter the existing revenue laws, and to encourage American labor; a bill to abolish slavery in Utah; a bill to repeal as much of the acts establishing territorial governments in New Mexico and Utah as recognizes slavery in said territories, and pledges the nation to admit new slave States into the Union; and a bill to repeal the Fugitive Slave law recently passed.

IN SENATE. THIRD-DAY, Sept. 17.

The Senate spent the day on the bill making donations of land to actual settlers, which was ordered to a third reading.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

The House passed the Senate bill granting swamp lands to certain States to be reclaimed; the bill granting alternate sections of land to the Alton and Springfield and the Mobile and Chicago railroads; and the Senate bill for suppressing the Slave Trade in the District of Columbia; the latter by a vote of 124 to 47.

IN SENATE. FOURTH DAY, Sept. 18.

Mr. Chase asked leave to introduce his bill for the prohibition of slavery in the territories. Mr. Clay hoped leave would not be [illegible]n; the agitation was at an end, and [illegible] not be renewed. Mr. Cass coincided, [illegible] Chase withdrew his request. Where[illegible]r. Pratt moved to take up his bill, [illegible]g it a penal offense, in the District of [illegible]a, to entice slaves from their masters. Mr. Hale reiterated Mr. Clay's remarks to Mr. Chase, against agitation! Mr. Chase said that if this bill passed, he should renew his bill. Mr. Baldwin moved an amendment, repealing so much of the old laws of Maryland, as established slavery in the District.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

The House decided, virtually, that Mr. Babitt, the delegate from Utah, should not be admitted to a seat, because elected before the passage of the law creating that Territory.

The bill providing for the payment of another installment ($3,250,000) of the Indemnity to Mexico, was passed by 128 to 36.

IN SENATE. FIFTH-DAY, Sept. 10.

Afte r an ineffectual attempt to get up the bill to prevent the enticing or assisting of slaves to escape in the District of Columbia, the bill creating the office of Surveyor-General in Oregon, and making donations [illegible] land to actual settlers thereon, was rea[illegible] third time and passed.

The General Appropriation Bill was ta[illegible] up, and several amendments adopted, am[illegible] which was one appropriating $500,000 [illegible] Custom House at San Francisco, a[illegible] other appropriating $50,000 for a [illegible] Hospital at the same place.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

The whole day was spent upon the Navy Appropriation Bill. In the course of the discussion, it was stated that in a time of profound peace the bill appropriates within a fraction of nine and a half millions of dollars for the Navy. One of the speakers proposed to save two millions and three quarters by retrenching the number of seamen and midshipmen, providing a retired list for infirm officers, and the consequent reduction of provisions.

IN SENATE. SIXTH-DAY, Sept. 20.

The Senate passed the bill to establish certain Post Roads; also the bill to extend the Laws and Judiciary System of the United States to California. The bill to create Collection Districts in California, was amended and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

The House occupied the session in talking about the Navy Appropriation bill in Committee of the Whole. Mr. Kaufman offered an amendment incorporating thirteen officers of the late Texan Navy into the Navy of the United States, which was discussed and rejected.

IN SENATE. SABBATH, Sept. 21.

The bills relating to California were made the special order for Third-day next.

The Civil and Diplomatic Appropriation Bill was taken up. The amendment making an appropriation for the proposed experiment in regard to reservoirs on the the Ohio river, was agreed to after considerable discussion, as were several other amendments. The proviso, that the mileage of Members of Congress shall be computed by the mail route, and also the proviso that no member east of the Rocky Mountains shall receive more than one thousand dollars, or any west more than two thousand, was stricken out.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

The House spent most of the day on the Navy Appropriation Bill, during the discussion of which the propriety of abolishing flogging in the Navy was much talked of. The entire abolition of the punishment was refused, but it was decided that it should only be administered when ordered by court martial, and even then not until twenty-four hours after the rendition of the sentence. The spirit ration is to be abolished, and a commutation fee of five cents per day to be paid the sailor instead thereof.

Fifteen Days Later from California.

By the Steamship Philadelphia, which arrived at New York on the evening of Sept. 20, we have fifteen days later news from California. The Philadelphia had on board about a million of dollars in gold dust, which was brought to Panama by the Columbia and Carolina. The advices are very favorable, in regard to commercial affairs. Trade was settling on a permanent basis, and the accounts from the mines were more satisfactory than for months past. The waters had subsided, and the wet diggings were very profitable. Many of the dams had proved highly successful. The failure of Mr. Barton of Sacramento for over a million of dollars had created some sensation, although not unexpected; and he shows assets to the amount of $2,000,000.

But the most important news by this arrival relates to a riot and bloodshed at Sacramento City. A gentleman who came from Sacramento City by the Senator, on the 14th of August—the day before the steamers sailed from San Francisco—gives the following account of the affair, in a letter to the editor of the Pacific News:—

"A terrible excitement pervades the City of Sacramento. The Senator delayed her departure for San Francisco to gather particulars. The issue is one between the squatters and settlers and the citizen holders of property under the Sutter titles—and a bloody issue it promises to be. Several persons are already killed and wounded on both sides.

"The history and result of the affair, thus far, is briefly this: Large tracts of ground, covering the city and vicinity of Sacramento, are held by grants from Captain Sutter, who claims under his New Helvetia Spanish grant. The settlers hold, that Capt. Sutter's grant does not cover this territory; that it belongs to the Government. They have moved on and erected buildings; a suit for forcible entry and detainer is brought against them; decided for the plaintiffs, a writ of restitution issued; the officer attempts to execute it; is met by a body of armed squatters, who resist him; this occurred on Saturday, 10th; prior to this date an appeal to the County Court had been made by the attorneys for the settlers, Judge Willis presiding, and the right of appeal denied. Exasperation of course was the effect upon the party seeking redress from the higher Court. Meetings were held and resolutions were passed to resist the law. Nothing was done by legal process from Saturday until yesterday, (Tuesday,) when some six or eight persons were arrested for rebellion or resisting the officers and the process of the Court on Saturday, and two in default of bail, incarcerated in the prison brig.

"To-day a body of settlers repaired to the brig to release their two companions, where they met Sheriff McKinney, Mayor Bigelow, and a posse, who drove them from the ground, but no force was used until the settlers had retreated as far east from the rtver, up J street, as the corner of Fourth, near the Crescent City Hotel, when they were overtaken and turned at bay with pistols and guns. Forty or fifty shots were fired between the parties, and in the period of five minutes Mayor Bigelow was shot from his horse, through the body, arm, and in the face; not expected to live. The leader of the settlers, Mahloney, was also shot dead. The horses of both leaders were pierced with balls. Assessor Woodland, an auctioneer, was also killed while supporting the officers. Mr. Harper, Assistant P. M., was shot in the left hand and right shoulder, and others of the same side were wounded. Another man of the settlers was killed—shot through the body. A little girl was wounded while passing along [illegible] the shots flew in all directions around [illegible] cornor of J and Fourth, and the blood of [illegible] wounded streamed upon the side walks [illegible]hey were carried along. One man lead[illegible] a mule along the street was shot through [illegible]ead; from the top the ball passed down[illegible] through the neck.

[illegible] greatest excitemant still prevaded the [illegible]hen the boat shoved off. From six to [illegible] hundred settlers had assembled at the corner of [illegible]d Ninth sts. resolved to fire upon any [illegible]o approached them. The city is declared under martial law, and every citizen required to enroll his name at the City Hotel.

W. W. CHAPMAN.

THE TOURNAMENT AT VIRGINIA SPRINGS.—The fashionable season of the South closed with a grand tournament, a la Eglintoun, at the Fauquier White Sulphur Springs, Va. There were the Knights of Ivanhoe, Marmion, Lochinvar, and others with equally romantic names, on richly caparisioned horses, each willing to maintain at all hazards and against all competitors, the right of his lady to be proclaimed the Queen of love and beauty. After the contest the Knight Lochinvar, (Mr. R. A. of Virginia,) was declared to be the victor. He was accordingly crowned with a wreath of laurel and flowers, which he at once presented to Miss H. of Richmond, who was by that act acknowledged to be the Queen of Love and Beauty. She was then surrounded by her maids of honor, and presided over the festivities during the rest of the day and at the ball in the evening, which concluded the ceremonies, according to the laws regulating jousts and tourney in the olden time.

Dr Fox was killed by Dr. Randall, in Mercer county, Ky., on the 18th ult. Fox was sitting in a room of Randall's house, at a late hour of the night, in company with Randall's step-daughter. The latter remarked that it was time to retire, and said the would leave. Fox objected, blew out the light, and caught the lady in his arms; the lady screamed, Randall came in, knocked Fox down, and afterward, in a struggle, cut his throat, causing almost immediate death.

European News.

The steamship Canada, which arrived at Halifax on the 16th inst., brought news from Europe one week later, which was published in New York just nine days after leaving London.

The prominent occurrence noticed by this arrival is the mobbing of the Austrian butcher, Haynau, at the celebrated malt liquor establishment of Barclay, Perkins & Co. It seems that he arrived at London on Monday, and on Wednesday, having previously received a letter of introduction from Baron Rothschild, in which the Baron styles Haynau his particular friend, he went to visit the brewery of Messrs. Barclay, Perkins & Co. Haynau was accompanied by his aid-de-camp and interpreter. According to the regular practice of visitors, they were requested to sign their names in a book in the office, after which they crossed the yard with one of the clerks. On inspecting the visitor's book, the clerk discovered that one of the visitors was no other than Marshal Haynau, the late commander of the Austrian forces during the attack upon the unfortunate Hungarians. It became known all over the Brewery in less than two minutes, and before the Marshal and his companions had crossed the yard, nearly all the laborers and draymen ran out with brooms and dirt, shouting out, Down with the Austrian Butcher, and other epithets of an alarming nature to the Marshal. The Marshal finding how matters stood, and likely to get a warm reception from the sturdy brewers, thought prudence the better part of valor, and began to beat a retreat, but this was not so easily done. The attack was commenced by dropping a truss of straw upon his head, after which grain and missiles of every kind were freely bestowed upon him. The men next struck his hat over his eyes and hustled him from all directions; his clothes were torn off his back. The Marshal's companions were treated with equal violence. The party finally succeeded in reaching the entrance gate, but no sooner had they made their exit, than a crowd of coal heavers, who waited upon his Highness, seized upon him. He was pelted, struck with every available missile, and even dragged along by his moustache, which afforded ample facilities from its excessive length, still battling with his assailants. He ran in a frantic manner along the bank side until he came to the George Public House, where he ran up stairs and concealed himself in a small closet. The furious mob rushed in after him, threatening to do for the Austrian Butcher, but, fortunately for him, they did not succeed in discovering his retreat. Ultimately the police came to the rescue, and he was removed in a police barge to the other end of the city. This assault has been the subject of comment in nearly all the London and provincial papers, and, while the majority agree in condemning the act, still they frankly admit, that the presence of so disreputable a character in England, was a provocation great enough to excuse even a greater outrage.

The effects which the death of the ex-King of the French will have on European politics has been the theme of much discussion in English papers, and it is generally thought that the event will have the effect of arousing the latent ambition of the Duke de Joinville. The dispute now pending in the Bourbon family will, it is thought, be healed, and an effort made to place him at the head of the French Republic.

The crops in England have been nearly all harvested, and it is now confidently asserted that there will be an average crop of grain, and that the potato crop is much sounder than was anticipated.

The Submarine Telegraph, between Calais and Dover, has broken. The wire gave way through chafing on a rock, within about two hundred yards of the French shore. Arrangements are being made for relaying the wire on an improved principle.

In Ireland, the Repeal agitation has been again revived by O'Connell, but the attempt proves almost an abortion. The Irish Tenement League, for the enforcement of Tenant Rights, is beginning to attract considerable attention in both England and Ireland, and all parties are fully impressed with the necessity of placing the law of landlord and tenant on a more equitable footing than it has been.

Accounts from China state that considerable sickness prevailed at Hong Kong. The new Governor of Macao, Sendor 'Acunha, has arrived in China, together with three small ships of war and about 1,000 troops. It is rumored that he is instructed to demand the absolute cession of the Peninsula of Macao to the Portuguese. His force is, however, considered insufficient for energetic coercive measures, should his demands be refused.

Dates have been received from Alexandria to the 31st of August. Cholera continued to prevail throughout the country. At Alexandria there were about fifty deaths daily; at Cairo double the number, and throughout the Delta it exists more or less.

The Queen has appointed Commissioners for inquiring into the state, discipline, studies and revenues of the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge.

FOUR DAYS LATER.—The U. S. Mail Steamship Pacific, with four days later news from Europe, arrived on Sabbath afternoon last, having run from Liverpool to New York in ten days, four hours and three-quarters—thirteen hours quicker than the passage was ever before made. The news is not important. The butcher Haynau, whose drubbing the papers continue to discuss, has left England secretly and by night to prevent a repetition of the uncomfortable and somewhat dangerous scenes to which he has been a witness. Louis Napoleon has been attending a grand naval review in the harbor of Cherbourg. From Germany we learn that the theater of war is at present inundated, putting a stop to all movements on either side. Meanwhile a Committee of the Peace Congress, consisting of Elihu Burritt, Joseph Sturges and Mr. Richards, has gone on a mission to Keil, where the Schleswig-Holstein Parliament is soon to meet. Should they succeed in inducing the Schleswig-Holstein Government to submit the questions in dispute to the judgment of a Court of Arbitration, they intend to go to Copenhagen on a similar mission.

SUMMARY.

MARRIED,

In Petersburgh, on the 14th inst., by Eld. James Summerbell, Mr. ARNOLD DAVIS, Jr., to Miss LUCINDA DANFORTH, both of Berlin.

DIED,

In Hounsfield, on the 2d inst., of a protracted illness of five months, Mrs. NANCY FRINK, wife of George Frink, in the 67th year of her age.

Mrs. F. was born in Stonington, Conn., and removed with her parents to Chenango (now Madison) Co., in this State, while a child. She was united in marriage with her husband, who survives her, when 19 years of age. In 1810 they removed to Preble (now Scott,) Cortland Co., when the country was new, and were among the earliest settlers of that town. About 30 years since, she became a member of the Seventh-day Baptist Church in Scott, and continued that connection till the organization of the Church in Hounsfield, which occurred soon after the removal of the family to that town, when she became a member of that Church, and continued such until her death.

Mrs. F. was plain and unaffected in her manners, and while her piety was simple and unostentatious she possessed an enlightened mind, a sound judgment, and a benevolent heart. Amidst the discouragements and afflictions attendant on the present state, her faith relied on the promises of the gospel, and looking to a glorious future imparted strength to endure present trials. For the prosperity of the church and the honor of the Redeemer, she constantly labored and prayed. She loved all the household of faith—she lived to see all her children and the majority of her grand children members of the Church to which she was attached. Her mind during her long sickness was firmly stayed on the Rock of Ages. Occasionally she felt enraptured in view of the near approach of heavenly rest. She seemed to entertain no desire but that the will of God should be done in her case; whether she lived or died, she felt that she was the Lord's.

By this dispensation of Providence, a bereaved and aged husband, and a large circle of surviving friends, are called to mourn. The poor have lost an invaluable friend, the church an esteemed and useful member. To her the change is gain. May the living imitate her virtues, and, like her, seek in true devotion to the interests of religion, an incorruptible inheritance beyond the grave.

In Brookfield, N. Y., on the morning of the 16th inst., Eld. S. B. CRANDALL, in the 47th year of his age. This death is indeed melancholy and unlooked for. He left his house about 7 o'clock, to turn his cow into the pasture; and as he was gone a longer time than usual, his wife became alarmed, and engaged some persons to aid her in searching for him. She first discovered him, hanging in the barn by a rope, when she gave the alarm to some men near by, who took him down. Efforts were made to restore him to life, but in vain. Eld. C. had been in poor health for some time past, and had returned the Sixth-day previous from a visit to Wisconsin. His appearance since his return indicated a deranged mind, which is the only apparant cause of the unhappy termination of his life. Andrew Babcock, Esq., the Coroner, held an inquest upon the body. The jury, after hearing the testimony in the case, declared in their verdict, that the deceased hung himself, he being in a deranged state of mind. He has left a widow and two children, whose distressing bereavement commends them to the sympathy and prayers of their numerous friends.

The deceased had for several years been a professor of religion, and died in hopes of eternal life. Miscellaneous.

Adventures of a Pearl-Diver.

During the year 1825, "The General Pearl and Coral Fishing Association of London," sent out Lieutenant Hardy, R. N., to Mexico, as their commissioner, to examine into the state of the fisheries, and their prospect of success. The fisheries he found in a very poor state; and further ascertained that the use of diving-bells for the purpose, however desirable they might be, could not be made available. He found that in many places the divers are afraid to go down for fear of the tinteros or ground sharks, and the mantas or marragos. This latter fish, he was informed, was an immense broad fish formed like a skate. They hug the divers with two large fins, and carry the poor fellows off. One was struck by a Captain Hall with a harpoon, and when taken, was found to measure twenty feet across the back! Notwithstanding these dangers, and anxious himself to ascertain the state of the oyster banks, Mr. Hardy became a diver.

"If it be difficult to learn to swim," says Mr. Hardy, "it is infinitely more so to dive. In my first attempts I could only descend about six feet, and was immediately obliged to rise again to the surface; but by degrees I got down to two or three fathoms, at which depth the pressure of the water is so great, that I can only compare it to a sharp pointed iron instrument being violently forced into the ear. My stay under water, therefore, at this depth, was extremely short; but as I had been assured that as soon as the ears should burst, as it is technically called by the divers, there would be no difficulty in descending to any depth, and wishing to become an accomplished diver, I determined to brave the excessive pain, till the bursting should, as it were, liberate me from a kind of cord which limited my range downwards, in the same way that the ropes of a balloon confine the progress of that machine upwards. Accordingly, taking a leap from the bows of the boat, full of hope and resolution, with my fingers knit over my head, the elbows straight, and keeping myself steadily in the inverse order of nature—namely, with my feet perpendicularly upwards—the impetus carried me down about four fathoms, when it became necessary to assist the descent by means of the hands and legs. But, alas! who can count upon the firmness of his resolution? The change of temperature from hot to cold is most sensibly felt. Every fathom fills the imagination with some new idea of the dangerous folly of penetrating into the silent dominions of reckless monsters, where the skulls of the dead make perpetual grimaces, and the yawning jaws of the sharks and tinteros, and the death-embrace of the manta, lie in wait for us. These impressions were augmented by the impossibility of the vision penetrating the twilight by which I was surrounded, together with the excrutiating pain I felt in my eyes and ears; in short, my mind being assailed by a thousand incomprehensible images, I ceased striking with my hands and legs; I felt myself receding from the bottom; the delightful thought of once more beholding the blue heavens above me, got the better of every other reflection; I involuntarily changed the position of my body, and in the next instant found myself once more on the surface. How did my bosom inflate with the rapid inspirations of my natural atmosphere, and a sensation of indescribable pleasure spread over every part of the body, as tho' the spirit was rejoicing at its liberation from its watery peril! In fact, it was a new sensation, which I cannot describe. I did not suffer it, however, to be of long duration. Once more I essayed, with a more fixed determination. Again I felt myself gliding through the slippery water, which, from its density, gave the idea of swimming through a thick jelly; again I experienced the same change of temperature in the water as I descended; and at the depth of six or seven fathoms I felt a sensation in my ears like that produced by the explosion of a gun; at the same moment I lost all sense of pain, and afterwards reached the bottom with a facility which I had thought unattainable. I no sooner found myself at the surface again, than I became sensible of what had happened to my ears, eyes, and mouth; I was literally bleeding from each of these, though wholly unconscious of it. But now was the greatest danger in diving, as the sharks, mantas, and tinteros have an astonishingly quick scent for blood."

In a short time our adventurous hero became a most expert diver; and after numerous submarine excursions, he ascertained that on the coast of California, the pearl oysters are not lying, as he had always previously supposed them to be, in regular beds or heaps, but that they chiefly occurred in sheltered bays, the bottoms of which were covered with large rocks; and that they were most abundant in fissures or clefts of these rocks, adhering firmly by a strong byssus, so strongly indeed that it requires no little force to tear them away. In such a coast as that, therefore, diving bells, he soon saw, could be of no use; for though they would afford a complete protection to the diver from the voracious monsters of the deep, yet the particular situation in which the oysters occurred most abundantly, would necessarily prevent the people employed in descending in diving bells from reaching them.

In diving, Mr. Hardy tells us it was usual for the person so employed to carry a short stick about nine inches long, and pointed at both ends. Armed with this an experienced diver will fight the shark in his own domain. He grasps the stick in the middle, and when attacked by the shark, he thrusts it into the monster's expanded jaws, in such a position that in attempting to seize his victim, the jaws close upon the two sharp points.

He had no adventure of this sort to boast of himself, during his diving excursions, but a native, of the name of Don Pablo Ochon, who was for many years a superintendent of the fishery, and himself an expert diver, gave him the following account of one of his watery adventures:

"The Placer de la Pierra Negada, which is near Loretto, was supposed to have quantities of very large pearl-oysters round it—a supposition which was at once confirmed by the great difficulty of finding this sunken rock. Don Pablo, however, succeeded in sounding it; and, in search of specimens of the largest and oldest shells, dived down in eleven fathoms of water. The rock is not above a hundred and fifty or two hundred yards in circumference; and our adventurer swam round and examined it in all directions, but without meeting any inducement to prolong his stay. Accordingly, being satisfied that there were no oysters, he thought of ascending to the surface of the water; but first he cast a look upwards, as all divers are obliged to do who hope to avoid the hungry jaws of a monster. If the coast is clear, they may arise without apprehension. Don Pablo, however, when he cast a hasty glance upwards, found that a tintero had taken a station three or four yards immediately above him, and most probably had been watching during the whole time that he had been down. A double-pointed stick was a useless weapon against such a tintero, as its mouth was of such enormous dimensions, that both man and stick could be swallowed together. He therefore felt himself rather nervous, as his retreat was now completely intercepted. But, under water, time is too great an object to be spent in reflection, and therefore he swam round part of the rock, hoping by this means to avoid the vigilance of his persecutor. What was his dismay, when he again looked, to find the pertinacious tintero still hovering over him as a hawk would follow a bird! He described him as having large, round, and inflamed eyes, apparently just ready to dart from the sockets with eagerness, and a mouth (at the recollection of which he still shuddered) that was continually opening and shutting, as if the monster was already, in imagination, devouring his victim, or at least, that the contemplation of prey imparted a foretaste of the gout. Two alternatives now presented themselves to the mind of Don Pablo—one, to suffer himself to be drowned; the other, to be eaten. He had already been under water so considerable a time, that he found it impossible any longer to retain his breath, and was on the point of giving himself up for lost with as much philosophy as he possessed. But what is dearer than life? The invention of man is seldom at a loss to find expedients for its preservation in cases of great extremity. On a sudden he recollected that on one side of the rock he had observed a sandy spot, and to this he swam with all imaginable speed, his attentive friend still watching his movements, and keeping a measured pace with him. As soon as reached the spot, he commenced stirring it with his pointed stick, in such a way that the fine particles rose and rendered the water perfectly turbid, so that he could not see the monster nor the monster him. Availing himself of the cloud by which himself and the tintero were enveloped, he swam very far out in a transvertical direction, and reached the surface in safety, though completely exhausted. Fortunately he rose close to one of the boats, and those who were within, seeing him in such a state, and knowing that an enemy must have been persecuting him, and that by some artifice he had saved his life, jumped overboard, as is their common practice in such cases, to frighten the creature away by splashing the water; and Don Pablo was taken into the boat more dead than alive."

The Day of Atonement.

This most important and most sacred day of the year, in the estimation of all pious Jews, occured last week. The following account of it is copied from the Asmonean, a Jewish paper published in this city:—

The origin and institution of the Day of Atonement is to be found in Leviticus xvi, 29:—"And it shall be unto you a statute for ever: in the seventh month, on the tenth day of the month, you shall afflict your souls, and do no work at all; the denizen as well as the stranger that sojourneth among you: for on that day shall ye be atoned for, to purify you: from all your sins before the Lord shall ye be purified. The first amongst your sabbaths shall this day be unto you, and ye shall afflict your souls: this is an everlasting statute, And the atonement shall be made by the priest, who has been anointed, and consecrated, to succeed his father in the priesthood, and who puts on the linen garments and the holy garments; and he shall atone for the holy sanctuary, and for the tent of the congregation, and for the altar shall he atone, and for the priests, and for all the people of the congregation: And this shall be an everlasting statute unto you, to make an atonement for all the children of Israel from all their sins once a year." And again, in Leviticus xxiii, 26:" And the Lord spake unto Moses saying, Speak unto the children of Isreal, and say, Also on the tenth day of the seventh month is the day of atonement; it shall be a holy convocation unto you; and ye shall afflict your souls, and offer a burnt offering unto the Lord. And ye shall do no work in that same day; for it is a day of atonement, to atone for you before the Lord your God. And every soul that shall not be afflicted on that same day, he shall be cut off from among his people; and every soul that does any work on that same day, that soul will I destroy from among his people. Ye shall do no manner of work: this is a stature for ever unto all your generations and throughout all your dwellings. It shall be unto you the first amongst your sabbaths, and ye shall afflict your souls; on the ninth day of the month at even: from even to even shall ye celebrate your sabbath."

While the Israelites in their own land worshiped at the altar of their temple, and in strict accordance with the rites dictated by their God through Moses his servant, the service of this day was equally solemn and splendid; it was the only day throughout the year on which even the cohen hagodol ("the high priest") presumed to enter the most holy sanctuary of the temple, or to pronounce the venerated and dreaded name of the Deity, which at any other time it was unlawful even for him to utter. The glories of this great day, while it was still celebrated in the place "which the Lord had chosen, here to enthrone his name," are commemorated in the service of the Synagogue. In the present article we must content ourselves with giving a concise sketch of the observances of the day now in use.

According to tradition, the Day of Atonement, even before the giving of the law, was a day of atonement and pardon. Adam did penance and was pardoned, on this day. Abraham entered into the covenant of circumcision on this day, Moses, after he had broken the first tables, ascended the mount again on the first day of Elul; so that the second forty days expired with the Day of Atonement, on which day the Lord pardoned the people, and revealed his thirteen attributes. The Jew, therefore, approaches this (to him) most important day with mingled feelings of holy awe and beatitude. The eve is allotted to solemn feasting; and at sun-set the twenty-four hours fast and continued prayers commence. These prayers chiefly consist of confessions of our sins and utter unworthiness, imploring the Divine Mercy to pardon us.

The preparations for the fast partake of that awful solemnity with which this life is quitted for a better world. It is customary in the evening for parents to bestow their benediction on their children; and the truly pious Jew pronounces this blessing with the fervor and heart-felt emphasis of his dying moments. Whosoever meet on that day, be they previously acquainted or complete strangers, salute each other with brotherly love and sincerity. If any quarrel or dispute exists between two Jews, is is obligatory on them to become reconciled, before either of them presumes to appear in the presence of his God. He that is conscious of having wronged his neighbor, is bound to offer reparation. He that is conscious of having offended or injured his neighbor, is bound to beg his pardon, and to appease him. The Talmud saith, in the treatise, Yomah," R. Eleazer, the son of Asaria, preached' From all your sins before God shall ye be purified. (Leviticus xvi, 30.) Your sins before God only. A transgression which man is guilty of toward his God, the Day of Atonement will atone: but a transgression that man is guilty of toward his neighbor, connot be atoned for, until he has appeased his neighbor. Hence it is customary even for intimate friends, who have been in daily intercourse, to solicit each other's pardon, lest even any unintentional offense remain unappeased.

The Old School Law of New York.

From the Free School Clarion.

As it is frequently asserted that "the Old School Law was good enough as it was;" that "anybody could educate his children under it;" that "it worked well enough," &c.; I propose to give a few examples of its "workings" that came under my own observation.

In the winter of 1839, an individual, (I will not call him a man) the owner of a large farm which was paid for, and who in the spring bought another, for which he was to pay $10,000, and had cash in hand for the first payment, $2,000, who had four children of a suitable age to attend school, whose oldest son, a young man of twenty years of age, could scarcely write his name, or read intelligibly, and had not thoroughly mastered the fundamental rules of arithmetic, said, he "could not afford to have the winter's school continue over three months, as the tuition would come high, and he should not be able to pay it." He was a trustee, and declared himself well satisfied with the teacher, saying "the school was the best they had in the district for many years." It closed in February, numbered forty-five, and the teacher received $16 per month!

I knew another individual, a man of no property, who had a family of eight or nine children, which he supported by day labor, sending six or seven of them to school, who rented a house for his family at $40 a year, and paid the tuition of such of his children as were of sufficient age to attend school, for from eight to ten months each year, until by toil and privation he had broken down his constitution and was unable to labor all the time—when the Trustees generously remitted one-half his rate bill.

In another District, upon asking an individual who had a family of six children, of the proper age to attend school, of whom but three were in attendance, why he did not send the others, he replied, "that he did not feel able to do it." I told him, that I would see that they were exempted if he would only send them. He shook his head, saying "that he could not bear, as he worked about from day to day in the neighborhood, to hear the people say, 'We have had to educate ———'s children.'" One-half of his children were sent to school the fore part of the Winter and then withdrawn, and the remainder of a suitable age occupied their places for the remainder of the term. I afterwards learned, that when he had worked hard for bread for his family, of which he stood in immediate want, he not unfrequently found it applied upon some rate-bill which happened to be in arrears!

In the winter of 1848–9, happening to enter a large school of 250 scholars where the Trustees were in the habit of remitting the tuition of such as were unable to pay it, I observed several of the scholars in tears. They were little girls of ten or twelve years of age. Upon inquiry as to the cause, with some degree of hesitation, they said that "the other children had been calling them indigent scholars," saying that "their parents had to pay their tuition for them, for their own parents were too poor to pay their tuition." With hearts almost broken with grief, and with sobs half suppressed, they looked up to me and said, "We are not to blame, are we, if our parents are poor?" Upon inquiry, I learned that it was not uncommon for those exempted to be termed, both by old and young—"Indigents;" and that same school under the present Free School System, defective as it is, has had at least THIRTY PER CENT. ADDED TO ITS NUMBERS. Names and dates can be given.

These are only a few of the many similar instances that might be detailed to show the beautiful "workings" of the Old School System—a system that should only be tolerated among a barbarous people, in a semi-barbarous age.

An Observer.

Genesee Co., Sept. 1, 1850.

A Young Sinbad.—The Norwich (Conn.) Courier thus narrates the narrow escape of a boy 14 or 15 years of age, named Loomis, from drowning in the Sound a few days since. The lad wished to visit New York, and for this purpose he secreted himself on board the steamer Knickerbocker, on Monday night—reached New York safely, and set out to come home by the same boat on Tuesday evening. About midnight, when the steamer was off Saybrook, the young scape-grace fell overboard in some way—in just what way he himself seems unable to explain. He cried for help, but nobody heard him, and the boat went on her way. He says his first impulse was, after finding himself left to his fate, to strike out for the Connecticut shore; but looking in the direction of New York, he saw, or thought he saw, a vessel of some sort in the steamboat's wake, and he concluded to "lie to" a while, till he should find what it was and whether it was likely to come within his reach. The result was that she came steadily on, nearer and nearer, till she came within hailing distance. He "spoke" the craft, which proved to be a fishing smack, and was soon picked up by her and taken into New London.

THE WILD PALM TREE.

'Mid rocks, and sands, and barrenness,
  How beautiful to see
The wild Palm in its desert dress—
  The solitary tree.

Alone, amid the silent wild,
  It rears its spreading crest;
The boundless desert's favored child,
  In constant verdure drest.

An emblem of that faith that cheers
  The pilgrim on the road,
Through life's dark vale of care and tears
  Beneath his earthly load.

For, like that faith alone it stands,
A bright oasis in the sands,
With hand-like leaves against the sky,
Pointing to Immortality.

Shipwreck, Suffering, and Endurance.

George Davis, Captain of the schooner Thornton, was taken up by the steamer Julius D. Morton, four miles out from Michigan City, floating on a spar. The Chicago Tribune gives the following account of his sufferings, as detailed by himself:—

At the time of the disaster, the schooner Thornton, in charge of Capt. Davis, assisted by two hands, was on her passage from Muskegon, freighted with lumber belonging to Mr. Parks of the former place. The vessel was driven out of her course by the violence of the storm, and, on Friday afternoon, when about six miles north east of this port, she became unmanageable and capsized, precipitating the Captain and crew into the angry flood. Fortunately a spar, which had been lying loose upon the deck, floated near them, and all three grasped it, supposing the vessel had sunk, though she afterward floated ashore.

For the next twenty-four hours, the three shipwrecked men were driven about at the mercy of the wind and waves, they knew not whither; at the end of which time, (Saturday afternoon,) the two companions of Capt. Davis, exhausted by cold, hunger, and fatigue, relinquished their hold upon the spar, nearly at the same time, and sunk to rise no more. Capt. D. supposes that at this time they were somewhere near the middle of the lake.

After the loss of his companions, Capt. Davis was driven about he knew not whither, the only incidents occurring to break the dreary monotony being the sight of two or three vessels. Only one of them came within hailing distance, and this he thinks was on Monday or Tuesday, he is not certain which. The vessel was near enough for him to read her name, and a man whom he supposes was the captain, seemed to see him in the distance, and afterwards several of the crew joined him, and looked in the same direction. Capt. D. thinks they must have seen him, but the vessel held on her course, and the hope of rescue which he had indulged a moment before, gave place to black despair.

From that time till he was picked up by the crew of the steamer Morton, between 9 and 10 A. M., on Friday, there was nothing to relieve the horrible monotony of his long, aimless voyage, except that at one time he drifted within about a mile of the eastern shore of the lake, but he was then too much exhausted, too weakened and benumbed in body and paralized in mind, to make the attempt to swim ashore.

The pangs of hunger became so pressing, toward the last, that the poor sufferer attempted to reach a dead body that floated near him, with the dreadful thought of satisfying it by eating a portion of a fellow creature, but it eluded his grasp. After this, he does not know when, he gnawed one of his hands to relieve the pain of famine, and afterward he gnawed the other in the same manner.

The Turkish Envoy.

The daily papers have said a good deal of late about Ammin Bey, the Turkish Envoy, who recently arrived at New York. The following translation of his reply to the address of the Mayor welcoming him to the City, gives the best account we have seen of the objects of his visit:—

"It has been my happiness to be appointed on the part of my Government to visit the United States of America as a Special Agent, and I now have the honor to express my most deeply felt gratitude for the kind and hospitable reception which the great city of New York has so generously offered me.

"The chief objects of my mission are to visit the principal institutions of public and private industry of this country; to examine, with a view to deriving profit and advantage from them, for my own noble Sovereign, whose benevolent heart is occupied, at all times, with the desire to advance and promote the happiness and prosperity of his own People. It will, therefore, be to me a great and peculiar satisfaction to visit the Iron Works, the Building Yards, the Manufactories of all kinds, of this city, and to inform myself, by attentive examination of the many useful inventions and improvements, which I am aware are constantly being made by the citizens of New York and of the United States generally. I am desirous, also, of making myself particularly acquainted with the Schools, and other places of public education of the city, with a view to making a Report on the same to my own Government. Allow me to repeat, honored sir, how sensibly I feel for the great kindness which has been so generously shown me, on my arrival to the New World—of which I shall ever entertain the most pleasant recollection; and I sincerely hope that my humble mission here, will have the effect of strengthening those friendly relations which have always existed between the United States and the Government of my revered Sovereign.

Calhoun's Statue and Temple.

The Mercury says that the City Council of Charleston, deeming it due to the illustrious reputation of the late Mr. Calhoun, determined to erect a temple to contain Mr. Powers' classic statue of that lamented Statesman. The temple is to be of white marble. Its form or plan is octagonal. The building will be raised upon, and entirely encompassed by, a flight of eight steps. These will ascend to a marble pavement, in the center of which the statue will be placed. In each of the eight sides of the building, will be an arched opening; and at each of the eight angles will be a pier and attached Corinthian column. These columns will be surmounted by an entablature, with modillion cornice. The frieze of the cornice will be encircled with Acanthus, and entwined with medallions, bearing the arms of the State, the City, and other appropriate insignia.

From the entablature springs a dome roof, composed of sixteen enriched marble ribs, terminating at the apex with an exquisite and highly wrought marble fineal. The panels between the ribs of the dome will consist of glass, through which light will be introduced upon the statue below. The glass panels will have two parallel faces. The exterior ones, being about an inch thick, will imitate white marble, and will be rendered semi-translucent, by a chemical process of hydrofluoric acid. The interior panels will be of white glass, with appropriately enameled figures. The frieze within the temple will be enriched with sculptured work, representing the funeral procession of Mr. Calhoun in Charleston. Gas will be so introduced as to illuminate the building at night, and so managed as to throw a very soft and imposing light around the statue.

The clear interior of the temple will be a little over twenty-two feet; and its entire hight, from the ground to the top of the fineal, forty-six feet.

On the second step, at each angle of the building, will be placed eight pedestals, supporting a like number of marble vases. In each of these will be cultivated rare plants and flowers, emblems of our constant and perrennial remembrance of our beloved statesman.

Land Monopoly in the West.—Austin C. Hewitt, who has been traveling through the North-West, writes from Beloit, Wisconsin, to the Wyoming Mirror, as follows:

"As evidence of the evil effect of Land Monopoly, I will mention one instance. On Rock Prairie Rock County, Wis., which is said to be the Queen County of the State, there are three or four contiguous square miles, owned by three or four individuals; and, for aught I know, many more, and even larger tracks of land, may be owned by as few individuals. Consequently, the land that originally cost the purchaser $1 25 per acre, now cannot be had at less than $5, or $6, or $10 per acre. Now, had the land been limited to actual settlers, in lots of 160 acres each, whole counties, that now contain not more th 25an or fifty inhabitants, would, long before this, have supported an enterprising and happy population."

Variety.

Last week Stillman, Allen & Co., of the Novelty Works, New York, cast one of the enormous bed-plates of the new steamer Humboldt, of the Havre Line. No less than 80,000 pounds of metal was used. When the vast reservoirs of molten metal were filled, and all was ready, the gates were opened and in two minutes the mold was charged. The pouring of the two rivers of glowing metal, the escape of gas and flame from the mold, the sparkling of the fluid as it rushed up from the vent holes and ran along the trench below, made up about as good a representation of the eruption of Vesuvius as one could desire.

An American from Boston is now at Newfoundland who is about applying to the local Government for permission to make a submarine examination of our coast, and to retain all property which may be raised; the parties concerned have a vessel at St. Shotts, and are provided with English divers, and with the necessary submarine apparatus and machinery for raising sunken property. Some years ago a large amount of specie was lost in the Drake, man of war, near St. Shotts, which we suppose has been the inducement to this enteprise.

Some admirers of the genius of Robert Fulton and its marvelous results in Perry County, Indiana, have resolved on an effort to erect a monument to his memory, at Troy, Indiana, six miles below Cannelton, on a lofty hill, near the Ohio, close to the spot where Fulton selected a tract of land for his home, whereon he and his brother established a wood-yard, and near which his brother's remains lie buried.

The chief object of the Society will [illegible] grant to qualified Engineers diploma[illegible] ing their competency, so that none [illegible] can be entrusted with an office whi[illegible] volves so largely and continually the [illegible] of life and property.

It is stated in the proceedings of the N. Y. Ecclesiological Society, that all articles of church furniture can be imported free of duty as articles of taste, not intended for sale; and that as articles contributing to the instruction of the people, they are exempted, by the decision of the Secretary of the Treasury.

The Baltimore Sun says: The announcement that an individual designed to walk a wire stretched 40 feet from the ground, a distance of 400 feet, at the lower end of Broadway Market, yesterday afternoon, attracted some three or four thousand people to witness the feat. At 5 o'clock, he made his appearance on the wire, and accomplished his undertaking.

The Liverpool Times says, that the American line of packet ships arriving in the London docks from New York, continue to bring large quantities of wine, the produce of the south of Europe, as part of their cargoes, for reasons which make it more advantageous to carry the wine twice across the Atlantic than to import it direct.

OUR FOREIGN MISSION.

Extracts from a Letter of Mr. Carpenter.

SHANGHAI, May 10, 1850.

Executive Board of the S. D. B. Missionary Society:—

Thanks to God that we are all in good health, and enjoying, to some extent, as we trust, those influences from above which enable us to feel in reference to our work somewhat as one more worthy felt in reference to his, when he said, "Who is sufficient for these things?" May we never lose sight of our insufficiency, lest we at the same time lose sight of Him who is all-sufficient; for this fallow ground is not to be broken up, I am fully persuaded, by a few kind wishes, a few faint prayers, or a few fitful efforts of ours. Nothing but the power of the Highest can effect so great a work. And among other instrumentalities, He may call for martyr blood to unseal the closed sympathies of these spell-bound souls, and teach them that there is something in the heart of Immanuel, and of his followers, which they have not known. But if a milder destiny await us—if the word of God, which is the precious seed of the kingdom, under the ministration of the life-giving Spirit, is the means most to be relied on—indeed, if these are the only means that can be relied on, then most earnestly would we be engaged in proclaiming that word, and most devoutly would we look up for the forthcoming of that Spirit. Doing this, have we not reason to expect success? And neglecting to do this, why should we deceive ourselves with vain hopes?

Aside from making preparation for the pulpit, which requires no less attention here than at home, my time is mainly spent upon the classics. During the hours of relaxation from study, however, I find almost daily opportunities of direct religious conversation with the natives, and frequently such opportunities occur several times in a day. I would not choose to make so frequent mention of these little interviews, were it not my duty to make the Board acquainted with my labors, of which these constitute a part, and perhaps not the least interesting part. You wish to know what we are doing, and also what effect the word has upon the minds of the heathen. I will therefore make a few brief extracts from my journal.

March 23d—Evening. Preached to about a hundred and thirty, the largest congregation we have had since our chapel was opened.

28th. Several persons called on us, and listened to some remarks intended to lead them to Christ.

30th. Preached to about sixty persons; good attention. Also explained the word to a group of about twenty souls outside the city.

April 1st. Had a long conversation with a teacher. He freely admits the truth of all I can say. Such admissions can be obtained in any quantity, and they would be exceedingly encouraging if we could by any means persuade ourselves that they were connected with any other than worldly affections.

2d. Conversed with a family in the country; also with another group of about fifteen souls. They listened to my remarks in a respectful manner.

7th. Had an interview with another family in the country. The man seemed to be somewhat interested. In the evening preached to about eighty.

13th. Preached to about forty, who paid good attention.

18th. Three days successively conversed freely with the inmates of a small hamlet in the country. To-day a Chinese printer, [illegible] is also a convert to the Christian relig[illegible] called to see if we had any business for [illegible] in his line. As I was almost ready to se[illegible] printer, and was thinking of sending out my teacher to find one, I asked him to call to-morrow.

19th. The printer came, bringing a small sheet tract as a sample of his style of doing work. This tract was headed, "The established periods of the ceremony-worship-day, which is the rest-day." Then followed the calendar and the fourth commandment. According to the tract, the fourth commandment enjoins, directly, without any change of day, the day commonly called the ceremony-worship-day. Upon inquiry I found that the printer really supposed that the seventh day specified in the commandment, and the day called here the ceremony-worship-day, were identical. And he was much surprised, and at first rather incredulous, when told that they were not identical. And when told that this confounding of two very distinct days had been acknowledged by his teacher (a missionary) to be a very great degree of carelessnes, he was, if possible, more surprised still, and said he should immediately go to him with it, and ask for an explanation. He seemed to be distressed at the thought that he had been desecrating the Sabbath of the fourth commandment, while he supposed he had been keeping it holy. I asked him if his teacher had never instructed him in regard to the change of the Sabbath. He replied, that he had not. I could not refrain from telling him plainly, that his teacher had told me, several months since, that he was in the habit of instructing his converts on that point. I have now before me a note from that same missionary, dated Aug. 23d, 1849 in which he says, "We certainly teach all our doctrines without concealment, whenever occasion requires, both publicly and privately." And yet here is a man who was baptized by him on the 2d day of September last, and has commenced preaching the gospel, but had always supposed he was keeping the identical day enjoined in the fourth commandment until I set him right.

20th—Sabbath eve. About one hundred present at meeting. The evening after the Sabbath there were more than a hundred present.

21st. A new neighbor came in and listened politely to some remarks. Also a company from Suchou called, listened to what we had to say, appeared very friendly, and asked for books.

22d. The printer called again on business. He had applied to his teacher for light; and the light that he received was that we at ya-joo loong are in error! He had applied to another teacher, and the light he gave him was that our companions in America were few!

25th. Took an excursion up the Wu-Sung to the pagoda. The prospect from the seventh story, at this season of the year, is very fine. During our stay several occasions were seized upon to communicate the tidings of salvation.

27th. To-day the printer (now a preacher) said he intended to keep the seventh day to please God, and the first day to please his teacher. He has also learned, that as so many are converted to keep Sunday, and that by the Holy Spirit, it would not be quite right to desecrate the day, although the law of God, he admits, does not enjoin it.

May 1. The printer says that his teacher now tells him that the day we keep is the Jewish Sabbath. His mind received a little help on that point. In my walk to-day I spoke the word to about twenty souls.

2d. Good news from the family of our former teacher, Chung. Mrs. C. knows more than I do about it; she must therefore tell you. But I must be allowed here to record the joy I feel in believing that God is present here in the exercise of his saving power. To his name be the glory, while our lips speak forth his praise. Yes, let the welcome tidings fly across the mighty deep, that China is beginning to stretch forth her withered hands unto God. Let angels bear the news to the general assembly above, that to one more, who has long been sitting in the regions of darkness, light is sprung up, and that she now seeks a place among those who are redeemed by the blood of the Lamb.

4th—Sabbath eve. A good attendance. At 1 o'clock the meeting was better attended than a week ago, though not more than forty or fifty present. Evening after Sabbath, about a hundred listened attentively to a discourse upon the resurrection of Christ. We are thankful to God that any are found who are willing to hear these things.

6th. I have just got out twelve thousand sheet tracts. The first seven thousand are entitled, "THE ONE THING NEEDFUL," and contain, first, a few plain statements, as follows: "Man's time in this world is short. All must die. After death, at the last day, you will live again. At that time Jesus will judge you with precision according to the deeds you have done in the body. This is the will of God. Once he died for your behavior; now he intercedes for you in heaven; hereafter he will come again to judge the world. At that time you will all stand before him to hear your destiny. Hence, that you diligently prepare beforehand to see the judgment day of Christ this is the one thing needful." Then follows the calendar, in which the Sabbath days are noted for the year; after which is a notice of the time and place of our meetings, and an invitation to attend. The next five thousand are entitled, "THE PERIODS OF THE REST-DAY." First is the fourth commandment; then the calendar; after which is the following, viz: "The rest-day of the fourth commandment is the seventh day, and nothing else. All who read the Bible clearly understand this. At present there are those who break the [illegible] commandment; they keep not the [illegible] day, but the first day, calling it the [illegible]-day, and also calling it the ceremony-[illegible]ship-day. This is an egregious mistake. [illegible]cius says, 'A mistake of a hair's breadth [illegible] carried out) would lead to a discrepancy [illegible] thousand miles.' Jesus says, 'Think [illegible] I am come to destroy the law or the [illegible]ets; I am not come to destroy but to [illegible]fill; for verily I say unto you, till heaven and earth pass, one jot or one tittle shall in no wise pass from the law till all be fulfilled.' If it be sinful to subvert one jot or tittle of the law, how much greater is the sin of not keeping the seventh day!" After this is a notice of the time and place of our meetings, with an invitation to such as like to hear to attend. These twelve thousand sheets cost me nine dollars. I felt, and still feel, that it is time, high time, for us to unfurl our banner. And I shall trust in Him who feeds the birds of the air for food; for man liveth not by bread alone, but by every word that proceedeth out of the mouth of God.

From a Letter of Mrs. Carpenter.

I know that the good news to which you have already been referred, must be to you glad tidings of great joy. But in order to understand fully the extent of our sweet surprise, you must recollect what I have formerly told you of the aged blind woman to whom it refers. She is the grandmother of our late lamented teacher, Chung-seen-sang, is confined entirely to her room, and much of the time to her bed. About the time Ne-May renounced idolatry, her grandmother was also apparently much interested in the doctrines of the holy Book, and we had at one time strong hopes that she would embrace them. But she afterwards told me, (as I also mentioned,) "that she could not thus decide to do; that as she could neither go in nor out to learn for herself, so neither could she see to read our Scriptures, or examine into the subjects of which they treated; that it was well for foreigners to worship their God, but for herself she could not renounce the gods of her fathers; she could not give up her idols." Since that time I have never pressed her on the subject, contenting myself with expressions of sympathy for her sufferings, and sometimes telling her I hoped she would yet believe in the true God, that after death she might go to be with Him in happiness forever, always taking care, while conversing with the family in her chamber, to remember that she was a listener, although I solicited from her no expression of her own sentiments. I knew that Ne-May was often reading to her the books we put into her hands; and I knew that the word of God, should not return to him void. The event was in His hands, and he has glorified himself in his own time.

I was met as usual, except with that increasing regard which the family have of late manifested; had asked to go up and see Ah-nah (grandmother,) but was waiting a little for Ne-May to complete the chapter she was reading, when May-May, (a girl of sixteen, who has lately become a believer,) came saying that Ah-nah had called for me. I found her sitting on her bedside, apparently in deep distress—took her hand as usual, inquiring after her health, and whether she was suffering much. "Oh yes," she said, "this is suffering, and I know not where to find relief. I am distressed now, and I fear that after death I shall be still more so; for then, I fear, I must fall into hell. Tell me what I shall do to be saved." So sudden, so unexpected was all this to me, that for the moment I knew not what to say; I could only look to the others for an explanation. May-May had seated herself on the bed beside her, and in a feeling but earnest manner said, "Grandmother is in much distress; she wishes to believe in Jesus, but fears she is not yet sufficiently informed to be able to do it; she wants to know how she may trust in him." I inquired how long she had been troubled. May-May said, "Three Sabbaths ago, Ne-May read to her from the Holy Book, and all day long she was so distressed that she could neither eat her rice nor drink her tea." My astonishment increased. She had heard, it is true, of a sorrow for sin; but a conflict like that through which she had been passing, she had never been taught to anticipate. Surely, this was the Lord's doing, and it was marvelous in our eyes. I opened the gospel of Matthew at the fifth chapter, and begged Ne May to read a part of it to her, as descriptive of her own state, and containing promises adapted to her desires. The attempt to comfort her seemed not in vain. I then endeavored to point her to the Lamb of God, as the only sacrifice for sin, and by simple illustrations to teach her the nature of faith. A sweet calm smile passed over her hitherto sorrowful face, and she exclaimed, "If such is faith in Jesus, I can say, that I believe in him." Joyful tidings; she had cast away her fathers' gods; she relied only on the Lord her Maker. And she had professed her faith, not secretly, but in the presence of the household, who had witnessed her former distress. Her eldest son, whom I had never before met, had been also present, had sat and listened to our conversation, and heard the declaration of faith from the lips of his venerable parent. All was quiet—solemn as the house of death; and I could not but feel, "Truly God is in this place and I knew it not. Not unto us, O Lord, not unto us, but to thy name be the glory."

5th. Have visited Ah-nah again. Found her rejoicing in hope, and her heart apparently full of love to God and his children. She spoke freely of her spiritual joys, of her hope in the pardoning mercy of God, and of her inward peace, which is now like a river. She says that the fear of death is taken away, and she only longs to depart and be with Christ. Mr. C. sent his last night's sermon on the resurrection; Ne-May read it to her, and the quiet smile which from time to time lit up her face, showed how precious to her were the truths it contained. Ne-May and May-May appear increasingly steadfast—are bold and cheerful believers. Other members of the family manifest a serious but quiet interest in our visits, and I now feel that a good work is indeed progressing in that house. What shall we render to the Lord for all his benefits?

MISSIONARY MOVEMENTS ON THE PACIFIC.

A Colporteur of the Tract Society writes to the Home Office in the following encouraging strain:—

"We are beginning to witness the fruits of Christian effort here. Gambling, horse-racing and bull-baiting on the Sabbath seem to be thoroughly suppressed. Our Total Abstinence Society and public worship, our Bibles, Tracts, religious books, and personal efforts, with the consequent improved public sentiment, and our city ordinances, under the blessing of God, have wrought wonders in prompting temperance and religion, and in suppressing vice. We have everything to encourage us to diligence and perseverance. The Spanish population are not only accessible, but they plead for Protestant books. Had all my publications been Spanish, I could have sold every book before this. Such instances as the following are not uncommon: I went into a Spanish settlement and gave a boy lounging on a sandbank a tract; he uttered an exclamation of delight, and soon more than twenty men, women and children rushed from a neighboring tent and swarmed around me like bees, holding out their hands for 'libros Espanoles.' On receiving them they began to read aloud, and such a Babel I never witnessed before. In a few minutes I had a congregation of thirty or forty, and I talked to them in my broken Castilian as I best could. Had you witnessed the eagerness and delight of these poor Mexicans and Chillians, you would not delay the shipment of a large supply of Spanish books and tracts."

Another letter from the officers of the Oregon Tract Society to Rev. Mr. Cook, Secretary of the Parent Society, urges the immediate employment of Colporteurs for that territory, and requests a shipment of publications to the amount of $1,200 for the Depository at Oregon City.

PROCLAMATION OF THE EMPEROR OF CHINA.

The following translation of the curious Proclamation of the new Emperor of China, is furnished for the Recorder by Eld. Solomon Carpenter, Seventh-day Baptist Missionary at Shanghai, China.

Having received from Heaven, to deliver to men, the Emperor issues this proclamation, saying, I of the Ta Ching dynasty have liberally received the protection of Heaven from Ta Choo and Ta Chong, who enlarged and established the great foundations of the Empire. Sz Choo included all China in his dominion. Sung Choo, Sz Chong, Kau Chong and Sung Chong,[*] with great merit, transformed the people by their influence. Their illustrious deeds secured the confidence of the people. My deceased father also, nobly sustaining the honor of the throne, reigned over the Empire thirty years. It was his concern, by night, that the people be clothed; by day, that they be fed. He ruled with diligence, and his splendid merit was revered by the court. Profound and expansive was his benevolence towards all the world. Thus he was enabled to tranquilize the Middle Kingdom and the outside nations; and all the tribes of the earth were under great obligations to him for the happiness which they enjoyed. Desiring that he might long live, that we might enjoy lasting and abundant happiness, how did I know that on the fourteenth day of the first month [Feb. 25,] he would announce and establish me as his successor upon the throne, only half a day before he took his departure? Then he bequeathed all his possessions to his little son. My own rectitude being but slender, I deeply fear and constantly study the plans of former Emperors.

My deceased Father having committed to me the throne of the Empire, which cannot long remain vacant, repressing my grief, I have obeyed the mandate. On this twenty-sixth day of the first month, [March 9,] with reverence I have worshiped Heaven and Earth, have repaired to the temple of my ancestors, and to the temple of the gods of the land and grain, to worship, announcing to them that I have received the kingdom, and offering my supplications that the coming year may be the first of a long series of years of plenty. Looking up to the former illustrious Emperors, I have consoled my heart with reverence and fear.

Now let the Proclamation of the new Emperor be sent abroad, and let a variety of favors be granted. The things that must be done are arranged in order as follows:—

1. To all residing at the Capital and elsewhere, from the royal family to the judges, favors are added.

2. To all residing in the Capital and elsewhere, from the Emperor's daughters to the Koh Koh,[†] favors are added.

3. In Manchuria and in China, all officers of government civil and military are promoted one step.

4. At the Capital and elsewere all officers of government, great and small, (except those whose parents have been promoted,) every one who is promoted shall have his father and mother promoted to the same [honorary] degree with himself.

5. Civil officers residing at the Capital, from the fourth rank and upwards, and those not resident at the Capital from the third rank and upwards, according to their present rank, may each send a son to the imperial college to be educated.

6. At the literary examinations, the number being full, they shall wait till the master of Ceremonies report to the Emperor the number, and pray for its extension. At the examinations for the first degree, the large Provinces may add thirty; smaller Provinces twenty, and the smallest Provinces ten. Mauchuria and Mongolia may add six, and Hu Kun may add three.

7. At the examinations of each Province for the first literary degree, the number being full, there may be added, of the best scholars, seven; of the next best, five; and of the moderate, three.

8. In the imperial college, the teachers and pupils may [this year] enjoy a vacation of one month.

9. In each Province, the scholars, whether in a Department or District, must regard the [usual] examination of the present year as a special favor, and the examination [extraordinary] of the coming year as the usual examination.

10. In each Department and District, the most filial, modest and true man shall be promoted to the rank of the white button, glorifying his person; and being found in readiness, he may be called into the service of his country. It is indispensible that investigation be made, and that such as are true and not dissolute be promoted.

11. In sacrificing at the tombs of former Emperors, at the tomb of Confucius, at the five mountains, and four rivers,[*] I have sent officers and caused them to sacrifice according to the ancient customs.

12. The crimes of officers, soldiers and people, except those guilty of treason or rebellion, children and grandchildren who have plotted the death of their grand parents and parents, disturbing domestic peace, the small or great wife who has killed her husband, servants who have killed their masters, those who have cut in pieces a man who ought not to have been slain, those who have plotted to kill and those who have killed with a reason being truly murderers, those who have killed with poison, witchcraft or poisonous medicine, robbers and magicians, all these are capital offences and unpardonable; soldiers disobeying or deserting are also unpardonable; besides these, all other offenses committed before the twenty-sixth day of the first month of the thirtieth year of Tau Kwaung, known or unknown, complete or incomplete, are now pardoned. If any man presume to inform against those who are pardoned, the crimes of the pardoned shall be transferred to the informer.

13. In each Province let an examination be instituted into the case of those who have been banished; and if any be found who have remained in banishment three years, peaceful and obedient, or if seventy years of age, let them be liberated, and let them return to their homes.

14. Ah! Assist me, ye ministers, to bestow favors upon those resident at the capital. Buoy me up that I may worthily oversee the peace of the Empire. Let all the royal family, the officers of Government, civil and military, great and small, each one lay open his feelings with a true heart, and add wings to my great plans, and thus render my country illustrious with myriads upon myriads of years of unbounded prosperity.

To be sent throughout the whole empire, that all may hear and understand.

[*] These are the names of the last seven Emperors of the present dynasty; i. e., they are portions of the names or titles given to them after their decease. For instance, the whole name of the first is Ta Choo Kan Wong Te, literally the Great Ancestor, the High Emperor. Under these appellations they are worshiped by the reigning monarch. Besides the names under which they are worshiped and sacrificed to in the ancestral temple, they have another designation, called the Ko Noh, country's title. This title is impressed upon their coin. It is also the general title by which they are known. Tau Kwaung is such a title. His other title is not yet known. It is to be given to him by his son the present Emperor.

[†] This is a Tartar title, not understood by my teacher.

[*] He sacrifices to the gods supposed to reside in those five mountains and in those four rivers. Only the Emperor causes these sacrifices to be made. The people, even intelligent teachers, do not know where these five mountains and four rivers are located. They only know that they are somewhere in China, and that the mountains are very high, and the rivers very large.

OBERLIN INSTITUTE.

A recent visit to Oberlin has impressed the writer of this article with its importance and value to the country, and he has thought that a brief history of its origin, progress and present condition would interest our readers, and perhaps correct misapprehensions which ought, in justice to them and to the Institution, to be removed.

Its origin was on this wise:—About the year 1831, the Rev. Mr. Shipherd, and a layman named Stewart, strongly impressed with the religious and educational wants of the Western States, and especially the defective character of female education generally, concluded to make an effort to meet these wants, and first of all undertook to interest the hearts of some others, in the common walks of life, in their plans and purposes, and proposed to them to leave their homes, and plant themselves in some new country, constituting a colony of Christians, who should consecrate their substance and their energies in establishing an Institution of learning, for the education of the poor, and especially for the training of minds, male and female, to act well their part as Christian citizens.

In furtherance of their views, the two individuals just named pushed into the woods of Ohio, and finding a tract of forest land, remote from any settlement, and unapproached by any path or highway, and possessing together less than five dollars in money which they could call their own, and having nothing else, they singled out some thousands acres of this wilderness tract, and contracted for its purchase upon credit, with reference to planting a colony, and with the understanding that the colonists should come as Christian missionaries to coöperate with them in their plan of Christian education.

In 1832, some of the colonists came upon the ground, cutting their way through the wilderness to reach the spot where they proposed to erect their temples of science and religion. The colonists were from various New England States, were fervent in piety, zealous in reform, under the deep religious impressions which had characterized the revivals of the few preceding years, and were thoroughly in earnest in their double purpose of promoting the cause of education, and in giving an illustration in practice of their ideal of a Christian community.

Facilities for education at the cheapest possible rate were furnished; manual labor was a condition of membership in the schools, and it was proposed that by the manual labor of each student the entire or a large share of his tuition and board should be paid.

At once large crowds of young men and women flocked to this new academic grove. Log cabins, temporary sheds, and the humblest shelter and the plainest fare, with the forbidding appearance of stumps, burnt clearings, and a surrounding wilderness, shutting them off from the world without, did not prevent the influx of great numbers of pious young persons who sought an education there, to be acquired by the sole labors of their own hands; the colonists' houses were filled with these new comers, and the hospitality of the people was stretched to its utmost capacity in giving them shelter and a home.

In 1835, or there about, the anti-slavery excitement running high, Oberlin distinguished itself for its uncompromising espousal of the rights of man, and upon the accession of some sixty recusant theological students from Lane Seminary, and the initiation as President of the Institution of Rev. Asa Mahan, and to the chair of Theology of the celebrated C. G. Finney, it assumed a new and more imposing phase. It now became a complete and thorough Institution; comprising a preparatory, collegiate and theological department, and has gone on from year to year in a course of success, and with a power and influence, remarkable and unexampled, when it has been considered how mighty and how many have been its enemies—how few and how feeble have been its friends.

For the last ten years, its average number of pupils has been rather more than five hundred, and being generally from the humbler walks of life, their average age is perhaps something beyond that of our college students generally—although many of them have not reached the college classes.

Oberlin is one of the precious monuments of the power and energy of the American yeomanry. The wise and the mighty, the ecclesiastics and the monied aristocracy, did not lay its foundations; have not bid it God speed on its way; the widow's mite, the believer's prayer, the poor man's efforts, have reared its walls, have cherished its progress, have made it a blessing to mankind.

Oberlin is a little Christian republic. The Institution is a democratic and Christian school. It has been, and it is, eminently useful. Its peculiarities have been exaggerated, its sentiments misunderstood, and hence misrepresented. But prejudice is wearing away, its influence begins to be acknowledged as healthful and conservative of all that is good, and even its enemies are inclined to admit that it is "more sinned against than sinning."

Oberlin is situated in the county of Lorain, State of Ohio, about 30 miles South West from Cleveland. P.

SIR WILLIAM JONES AND HIS MOTHER.

This learned and distinguished man was born in London, on the eve of St. Michael, in the year 1746. Mr. Jones, his father, survived the birth of his son William but three years; his family was respectable, and his character excellent. The care of the education of William now devolved upon his mother, who, in many respects, was eminently qualified for the task. She had by nature a strong understanding, which was improved by his conversation and instruction. Under the tuition of her husband, she became a considerable proficient in Algebra, and with a view to qualify herself for the office of preceptor to her sister's son, who was destined to a maratime profession, made herself perfect in Trigonometry and the theory of Navigation. Mrs. Jones, after the death of her husband, was urgently and repeatedly solicited by the Countess of Macclesfield to remain at Sherborn Castle; but having formed a plan for the education of her son, with an unalterable determination to pursue it, she declined accepting the friendly invitation of the Countess, who never ceased to retain the most affectionate regard for her. In the plan adopted by Mrs. Jones for the instruction of her son, she proposed to reject the severity of discipline, and to lead his mind insensibly to knowledge and exertion by exciting his curiosity and directing it to useful objects.

She so cultivated his mind, that at four years of age he was able to read any English books, and until his eighth or ninth year, she was his only preceptor. When in his ninth year he had the misfortune to break his thigh bone, which detained him at home more than a year; his mother was his constant companion, and amused him daily by the perusal of such English books as were adapted to his taste and capacity. To his incessant importunities for information, she was in the habit of using one reply, which, from his earliest years, made a due impression on him. This remark was, "Read and you will know." At a subsequent period of his life, Sir William Jones was in the habit of saying, that he owed all his intellectual improvement to his early obedience to his mother's favorite maxim—"Read and you will know."

With regard to religious instruction, she early taught him the creed and ten commandments; but one effect of her daily maxim is too remarkable to be passed over in silence. One morning, as he was turning over the leaves of a Bible in his mother's closet, his attention was forcibly arrested by the sublime description of the angel, in the tenth chapter of Revelation; and the impression which his mind received was never after erased. At a period of mature judgment, he considered the passage as equal in sublimity to any of the inspired writings, and far superior to any that could be produced from mere human compositions; and he was fond of relating and mentioning the rapture which he felt when he first read it. This remarkable incident took place before he had completed his fifth year.

His spiritual attainments as a Christian were quite worthy of his learning and literary distinction. In his mature years, when he had secured fame and worldly honors, he says: "I have carefully and regularly perused the Holy Scriptures, and am of opinion, that the volume called the Bible, independent of its divine origin, contains more sublimity, purer morality, more important history, and finer strains of eloquence, than can be collected from all other books, in whatever language they may have been written."

A missionary, in his report, says: "Methinks one reading this report says, 'Well, I will give five dollars to the cause. I can give this amount and not feel it.' Suppose, my Christian brother, you give twenty, and feel it."

DESTINY OF THE WICKED.

Having proved—I. That the wicked must necessarily suffer punishment of some kind, from the fact that they have transgressed the divine law; II. That the penalty of the law is not satisfied by their sufferings in this life; III. That it is not satisfied by the death of the body; IV. That it remains to be inflicted after death; and, V. That it will not be inflicted till after the resurrection, when death shall have finished its work upon the human race; we proceed to inquire—

VI. Will the punishment of the wicked consist in annihilation ?

Having looked somewhat at the arguments usually adduced on the affirmative of this question, we find them to rest mainly upon the terms used in Scripture to express the punishment of the wicked. They are "perish—utterly perish—destroy—destroyed—perdition—die—death—second death—consumed with terrors—destruction," &c.

But it is certain that some of these terms are not more frequently used in reference to the second death, than they are in reference to the first. For instance: "The righteous PERISHETH, and no man layeth it to heart." Isa. 57: 1. The context shows that it is the death of the righteous which is spoken of. But he enters into peace, although he is perished. Ver 2. Zacharias PERISHED between the altar and the temple. Luke 11: 51. The wicked antediluvians were DESTROYED from the face of the earth. Gen. 6: 7, 23. That is, they died. David said, "I will early DESTROY all the wicked of the land." Ps. 101: 8. The term evidently denotes the punishment of transgressors by death, as magistrates do. David did not annihalate them. "Thou turnest man to DESTRUCTION." Ps. 90: 3. "That Daniel and his followers should not PERISH with the rest of the wise men of Babylon." Dan. 2: 18. "And David said in his heart, I shall now PERISH one day by the hand of Saul." 1 Sam. 27: 1. "And there came down fire from heaven, and CONSUMED him and his fifty." 2 Kings 1: 10. "But of their children who were left after them in the land, whom the children of Israel CONSUMED not." 2 Chron. 8: 8. "I have pursued mine enemies, and DESTROYED them; and turned not again till I had CONSUMED them." 2 Sam. 22: 38.

Now, if men are said to be punished—consumed—destroyed, when they have merely suffered the first death, the application of such terms to the final condition of the wicked does not prove their annihilation, unless the application of them, to the first death also proves annihilation. The advocates of this doctrine are therefore driven to the extremity of maintaining, that the soul does actually suffer annihilation at death; in other words, that the whole man dies—the soul as well as the body. Death is regarded by them as an entire extinction of being. But if this be so, it is impossible to punish the wicked at all. For if the thinking spirit in man be entirely extinguished at death, the resurrection of man to a new consciousness is the creation of a new conscious being. It is not the same conscious being who once deserved punishment. If, through some exercise of Almighty power upon him, this new conscious being should suppose himself to remember things done in a former state, and charge himself with guilt accordingly, it would be, nevertheless, a false apprehension, and would lay no just foundation for his punishment. The punishment would, in reality, be inflicted upon an innocent being.

It may be said, however, that actual extinction of being does not take place till after the resurrection; and that, at the death of the body, the soul merely sinks into a state of unconsciousness—a profound sleep. But if so, by what power will the soul awake again to receive its merited punishment? Will it awake of itself? Is it according to the course of nature, that it should be aroused from its slumber just at that hour, and no sooner? Is there some fixed law of our being which will bring it about? Or will it be effected by the working of supernatural power? Certainly, the latter. We are therefore brought to this absurdity, that though God has so constituted the nature of man that he is capable of the highest degree of virtue, or of the most odious vices, yet there is no capacity in him to be punished or rewarded without the intervention of a miracle! Violence must be offered to his nature, before he can receive the reward of his doings!

We conclude, therefore, that the soul of the wicked man does not suffer extinction at the death of the body, neither does it sink into a state of unconsciousness. And if the terms we have been considering do not prove the entire extinction of being when applied to the first death, neither do they prove it when applied to the second. Hence, whatever may be said in favor of the annihilation of the wicked, the Scriptures, which are the ultimate authority, afford no countenance to the doctrine. The man of tender sympathies, and filled with all the ardor of social affection, may not be able to endure the thought, that a Being so good and benevolent as God is, should abandon any of his creatures to a state of endless suffering. He will venture to hope, that at length the guilty sinner will have a period put to his misery by the entire extinction of his being. But how faint must such hope be! For, as there is no example of annihilation within human experience, no reason can be drawn from analogy to support the supposition, that the existence of the soul will ever be terminated.

MR. PATTON AND THE SEVENTH-DAY BAPTISTS.

The Rev. Mr. Patton of this city, the * of the New England Religious Herald, has been rusticating a few weeks in the neighborhood of Stonington, and we judge from his letters, which have been published in the Herald, that the pleasures of his sojourn and wanderings abroad have not been without interruption. His principal annoyances have been, so far as we can learn, the dancing guests of his hotel, and the Sabbatarians of Rhode Island. We are not surprised that he should feel worried with the Stonington revelers, nor that he should feel grieved at the desecration of the day of Holy Rest, by the honest but mistaken people, who insist on keeping the Jewish instead of the Christian Sabbath, but we think he ought to have known better than to have written such a paragraph as this:—

> "It is worthy of note, that these Seventh-day Sabbatarians are all Baptists. It is very seldom that they receive accessions from any but Baptists. Why is this? Because the principles of interpretation insisted on by Baptists when endeavoring to sustain immersion and to overthrow infant baptism, lead, when consistently followed out, to the conclusion of these ceremonial literalists. The Baptists find it much more difficult to meet the arguments of this sect than other denominations do, and hence suffer more secessions on that ground. We commend this fact to the notice of our immersion brethren."

Now we venture to say that the Seventh-day Baptists do not receive accessions from the Baptists more than from other denominations. They receive accessions, as other sects do, from the ranks of worldly men, who are converted through their instrumentality. And if they do occasionally receive members from Baptist churches, this result should no more be attributed to our principles of interpretation, than the accession to our churches of Congregationalists, should be attributed to the principles of interpretation the latter adopt. If the Sabbatarianism of the people in question be chargeable upon our principles of interpretation, why may it not be said that their Arminianism is chargeable to the principles of our Pedo-Baptist brethren? We think the latter charge would be quite as legitimate as the former.

But let us look at the charge of our cotemporary a moment, and see whose principles of interpretation are responsible for the desecration of the Sabbath over which he so justly mourns. Our Sabbatarian brethren find a command in the Old Testament to observe the seventh day, and keep it holy. In the New Testament they find no repeal, and no special re-enactment, of this law of the Sabbath; but from the circumstances of its first enactment, and the fact that it is not repealed, they claim that they are still bound to keep the seventh day as the Sabbath of the Lord. This is the principle. Our Pedo-Baptist brethren find in the Old Testament a command delivered to Abraham, requiring him to circumcise his male offspring, and inasmuch as there is no repeal of the law, though there is no direct recognition of it in the New Testament, they insist that it is still binding on the children of faith; and while they do not perform the specific act which the law enjoins, they tender what they deem an equivalent, doing it in pursuance of the original law, and insisting that the integrity of the same is thereby maintained. Now we insist that the principle of interpretation in these two cases is identical, and that the only difference between our Pedo-Baptist and Sabbatarian brethren is, that the latter make a more simple and consistent application of it than the former.

In reference to our principles of interpretation, it is sufficient for us to say, that we take the word of God, as illustrated by the example of Christ and his Apostles, as our only guide. This is an authority which we deem ample; and as long as we are satisfied that the Apostles observed the first day of the week as a Christian Sabbath, we shall be content to do the same. When we are satisfied that they sprinkled infants in the name of the Sacred Three, or administered Christian Baptism to persons previous to the profession of their personal faith in Christ as their Savior, it will be time for us to adopt the views and practices of our Pedo-Baptist brethren.

Remarks.

We have in our denomination some sixty or seventy ordained ministers; and, in running over the list, we number from a dozen to eighteen who were once in good standing among our Baptist brethren. As for the number of private members of our churches who have come from the Baptists, we have no means at hand of determining how great it is; nor can we say by what process their minds were led to a conviction of duty to observe the Bible Sabbath. But we can vouch for some of them, that they became Sabbath-keepers because their Baptist principles, consistently followed out, drove them to it. That "the Baptists find it much more difficult to meet the arguments of this sect than other denominations do," the Secretary may be very unwilling to admit; but the awkwardness of its attempt to repel the charge, serves only to render the truth of it more glaring. Is it possible, that the editor does not see, that the application of the law of the Sabbath to the first day of the week, is just like the application of the law of circumcision to the institution of baptism? The editor, no doubt, holds that the first day of the week, under the name Lord's day, is a New Testament institution. He also holds that the fourth commandment is an Old Testament law. Is the absurdity of applying an Old Testament law to a New Testament institution manifest only when baptism is concerned?

But, perhaps the editor thinks himself quite free from this absurdity. He will, most likely, say that the fourth commandment has no binding force whatever under the gospel. He will argue, that the only law which regulates the "Lord's day," is the example of Christ and his Apostles. Nay, he does argue this. "This is an authority," says he, "which we deem ample; and as long as we are satisfied that the Apostles observed the first day of the week as the Christian Sabbath, we shall be content to do the same." We most sincerely wish, that the Secretary would furnish some proof of this point. It may be very well to imitate the example of the Apostles, especially if we can first be certain that what they did was intended as an example. But we do insist, that there is neither logic nor common sense in pressing duty beyond the example. The example is the full measure of our duty. As they have given no example of sabbatizing—that is, of resting from labor—on the first day of the week, we insist that their followers should not now be urged to do so. We have read of that instance, where the Savior met his disciples on the first day of the week to confirm them in the faith of the ressurrection. John 20: 19. And if disciples were now troubled with like doubts about that glorious fact, and it were necessary to hold a meeting on the first day of the week to dissipate them, we should be as eager as any one to summon them together. But, after all was done which such a meeting could do, for the removal of their doubts, we should, for anything we see in the example to the contrary, bid them go home again to their labors. We have read, too, of an instance where the disciples met together at Troas on the first day of the week. Acts 20: 7. But finding nothing said about their sabbatizing, nor any proof that they had not attended to their secular business through the day, before it was time to commence the evening meeting, we see no more reason than in the other case, why we should keep holy the day in question. We have also read something about the church at Corinth being required "each one of them to lay by him in store as God hath prospered him." 1 Cor. 16: 2. And for aught that the Christian Secretary knows to the contrary, Seventh-day Baptists comply rigidly with this injunction. It is true, they do not assemble themselves in a public meeting for this purpose, the injunction not requiring that they should. The injunction is simply, that each individual should attend to the duty for himself. "Let every one of you lay by him [himself] in store." The idea of a public assembly, and a public contribution box for holding the aggregate bounty of the whole church, is not in the record at all; it is rather inconsistent with it. Does the Secretary know, that Seventh-day Baptists do not attend to this duty at their own homes? For our part, we teach that they ought to; and we have reason to think that some of them are not unmindful of their duty. But they do not think, that the performance of this duty is inconsistent with doing a considerable amount of hard labor also; nor is there any thing in the example of the Corinthian church to forbid it. We hold the Christian Secretary to its own position. Let it furnish the proof, that "the Apostles observed the first day of the week as the Christian Sabbath." As we do not exchange with the Herald, the letters of the Rev. Mr. Patton, which have furnished the text for the Secretary's article, have not met our eye. If any one can supply us, we shall take it as a favor. The insinuation about the "Arminianism" of Seventh-day Baptists being "chargeable to the principles of our Pedo-Baptist brethren," requires explanation. We do not understand it. A careful perusal of a tract entitled, "An Address to the Baptists, by the Seventh-day Baptist General Conference," might be of service to our brother of the Secretary; and we therefore send him a copy.

BRITISH CORRESPONDENCE—No. 14.

GLASGOW, Sept. 13th, 1850.

The balance of power, and the balance of parties, largely engage attention in the present day—direct recognition of God, and immediate dependence upon Him, very little. "Be careful for nothing, but in every thing, by prayer," &c., is an injunction much disregarded, not merely by those who reject the Redeemer, but also practically by very many professing to be His people. The Lord saveth by few as well as by many; in some cases, rather by few than by many, where His glory so requires. But man's trust is much in man; and the combination of skill, and the combination of power, are looked to as a means of working moral transformations, of which the true reception of God's grace alone is capable. Kings combine for the preservation of their respective places and dignity—often forgetful of the old rebuke in a similar case, Shouldst thou help the ungodly, or love them that hate the Lord? We had lately a "Congress of Princes" on the Continent, having in view, as it was said, the restoration of Western Europe, and the Germanic Confederation has wrought hard to find a proper head on which to place the crown of the reviving Roman Empire. Now we have had at Frankfort a "Peace Congress," of which even bloody soldiers were members. However desirable "peace" must be to every Christian, we must still remember that He who calls upon us to "love the truth and peace," has declared his purpose of vindicating his character against the workers of iniquity—and that in doing so He will yet "take peace from the earth." Judgment in many forms He has threatened to pour out, and specially his "four sore judgments of war, famine, pestilence, and the beasts of the earth." To those eager for the promotion of peace, we therefore repeat, that the only effectual means for its advancement is a holy submission to Him who hath given His Son that He might redeem us from all iniquity.

Even now, is not God by His providences saying loudly to us, "Fear God, and give Him glory, for the hour of His judgments is come?" Visitations various and severe afflict the nations. The deadly disease called Cholera, and to which the name of Asiatic has been prefixed, as expressive of its unwonted appearance in other lands, has once and again visited Europe as an instrument of divine punishment. Having ravaged eastern Asia, carrying off 20,000 from the royal province alone in Cochin China, besides smaller numbers in the provinces, as it traversed the whole kingdom, (followed by drought, occasioning famine, increasing the misery,) extending to Siam, and breaking out among the English troops at Bombay—passing onward in its deadly march westward by nearly the same route, it arrived in Europe. Comparatively light, hitherto, though it has been, many deaths are reported at Halle and adjoining healthy towns and villages, confounding the physicians, while at Copenhagen, in Denmark, the most recent arrivals announce above 100 deaths in a day. This country, through milder forms of the same kind of disease, has been warned; and a few towns in Ireland, as also in England, as Wakefield, Manchester, Chatham, and London, have all had fatal cases reported, and cases still more numerous probably unreported from a vain desire to conceal the fact. While the Lord shakes His hand over us, He means not that we should be ignorant of the fact, but that we should repent and turn unto Him. The impressions for good from former visitations of this mysterious disease have in comparatively few cases been permanent, and the lessons so sought to be taught have to be repeated. Meanwhile, in anticipation of its more general spread, much talk has been made of sanitary measures, while little heed is given to the connection between moral causes and physical results. Medical men were formerly confounded; and although, confidently enough, many boasted of remedies discovered, no stay was put to the prevalence of death. Nay, that which by one was boasted of as a specific, (as the use of salt,) another declares to be the great cause of the disease. What has become of the wisdom of the wise! Turned into folly, by forgetfulness of God.

Africa has not escaped. The coast of Barbary having been visited, its inhabitants, in large numbers, with all the foreign residents, fled to Malta, leaving business utterly paralyzed, while even at Malta the same disease or one similar prevailed, carrying off its victims as rapidly. In Egypt, also, it has recently broken out, many having died both at Cairo and Alexandria. The paternal Viceroy fled at its first appearance, ordering a steamer and frigate with all necessaries to proceed for Rhodes.

For a considerable time has the scourge prevailed in South America—preceded as it was by yellow fever in some parts, with great fatality. In Bahia, in a short time, 8,000 were swept away by this fever, in which number were included many seamen and slaves. At Rio Janeiro its ravages were awful. For some time, the average number of deaths in the city alone was 250 daily. In the habor, in some instances, vessels lost every soul on board; in others, vessels having put to sea with new crews returned in a few days, frequently bereft of captain and officers, and with scarcely as many hands surviving as to be able to get back. Every English ship for a time suffered from it more or less, about the end of March and beginning of April of the present year; and the American Secretary of Legation died. It spread to all the neighboring towns along the shore, and even to Petropolis, 40 miles distant, lying high, and usually healthy. Pernambuco, Granada, Monte Video, St. Catherines, and Buenos Ayres, all suffered from this fatal fever.

Then came cholera, carrying off its victims within very few hours. In the city of Mexico, there had been 6,000 deaths at the last enumeration I have seen, while it extended itself in the surrounding country. At Piedad, with a population of 3000, it is stated 1000 died. It appeared in some of the West India Islands; and the United States have by it been warned. Besides the loss of those of less note, to this pestilential disease, as the mediate, if not the immediate cause, was attributed the death of their President, General Taylor. Surely the Lord hath a controversy with the nations; and it becomes us all to lay to heart the solemn warnings which thus and otherwise we are receiving. I have not exhausted the variety of judgment dispensations, nor fully presented the desolations occasioned by those I have named. We know the Lord has just occasion to be displeased. Let us truly and fully seek grace to return unto Him.

LEGACIES MADE AVAILABLE.

The Phaladelphia Ledger says that by the will of Mr. Frederick Kohne, a citizen of that city, who died in the year 1828, a large number of bequests were made to several benevolent and charitable institutions in Philedelphia and in the city of Charleston, S. C., to be paid at the death of the widow, who was named in the will as one of the executors. Mrs. K. is still living, and the only surviving executor; and, having expressed a desire to pay over to the several institutions the amounts of their legacies, one or more of them have already acceded to her wish, and received the funds. The amount of property devised was nearly $600,000, about one-half of which was left to the following institutions and charitable bodies:

To the Theological Seminary of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States of America, established near Greenwich, in the State of New York, $100,000; to the Domestic and Foreign Missionary Society of the Protestant Episcopal Church of Philadelphia, $100,000; to the Society of the Protestant Episcopal Church for the Advancement of Christianity, in S. C. $5,000; to the Ladies' Benovelent Society of Charleston, S. C. $5.000; to Shaser Dispensary, Charleston, S. C. $10,000; to the Bishop's Fund, S. C. $5,000; to the Female Episcopal Benovolent Society of St. James' Church, in the city of Philadelphia, for the use of the poor of the Church, $3,000; to the Female Association of Philadalphia, $5,000; to the Philadelphia Dispensary, $10,000; to the Orphan Society, of Philedelphia, $60,000; to the Infant Schools of Philadelphia, $5,000; to the Charleston Protestant Episcopal Domestic Missionary Society, $10,000; to the Mariner's Church, Charleston, $5,000; to the House of Refuge, in the State of Pennsylvania, $100,000; to the Society of the Protestant Episcopal Church for the Advancement of Christianity in Pennsylvania, $5,000; to the Pennsylvania Institute for the Deaf and Dumb, $20,000; to the fund for the support of the Bishop of the Protestant Episcopal Church in Pennsylvania, $5,000; to the General Episcopal Sunday School Union, $20,000. Total, $383,000.

SACRAMENTO CITY, CALIFORNIA.

[From a letter of J. D. B. Stillman to a friend in New York.]

A description of this city will always be new, for the changes of each month would alone be subject for several columns of ordinary newspaper gossip. Suppose yourself coming up the river, with little to break the monotony of river scenery—willowy banks and a uniform growth of oaks, with the dense undergrowth of briars, and here and there a glimpse of prairie beyond, or perhaps a marsh, thickly studded with dark green rushes, waving like fields of grain—when a crowd of vessels, moored on either bank. arrests your attention; a moment more, (if you are on a steamer,) and, mingling with the trees, a wooden city spreads itself upon the plain. The age of canvas is past—it is the wooden age. For nearly two miles along the river, and as far back from it, a crowded city meets the eye—the streets blocked up with goods of all descriptions, without risk of damage from rain—and large wagons with a long string of oxen or mules before each, or droves of pack mules loading or trailing their slow way to the mines. Throngs of uncouth men, covered with dust, and with unshaven faces, block up the passages. Now, as we walk along the levee, you hear the sound of gongs and immense triangles, calling the attention of buyers to auction sales of desirable goods just received. Arrived at the upper end of the levee, before us is a slough (which we pronounce slue—not sluse;) the high bank between it and the river is beautifully shaded with large oaks and sycamores; bath houses and restaurants are here, and the shore away round into the American Fork, is lined with vessels. Here, too, is a Machine Shop, the first in California in point of time.

Now let us up J street. Here, on the left, is a gorgeously furnished room, 100 by 40 feet; chandeliers, mirrors, gilded tapestry—whew! what a blaze! At one end is a pulpit, from which a brass band holds forth persuasive strains, to call the novice and the stranger to his ruin. The immense floor is covered with small tables, upon which are piles of silver and gold; and the chink-chink of the Mexican dollars is heard above the swell of music, while from the long-extended bar is drank the damning fluid to the tune of eight hundred dollars a day. It is called the "Empire." Opposite is the "Wood-cock," an eating house kept in a style not surpassed on Nassau-street for variety of eatables, or the style in which they are served up, at 50 cents per plate. Above Second-street is the "Humboldt"—profane use of a glorious name. What superb music, drinking, gambling, and looking on! Let us go. Here is an edifice erected by that wealthy propietor of hospitals, church[illegible] gambling houses, livery stables, banks, and storehouses, Barton Lee, the patron [illegible] God and the devil. Heer that master of the violin—that rich voice, how it swells through the lofty hall, touching the heart with fond reminiscences of home. Ah! it is the Syren's song; it would line the unwary to a snare. Let us call for "The Spider and the Fly;" or, rather, let us away. It is a splendid building, you will say, for this country—40 feet wide, 60 high, and 120 deep.

I want to show you a part of the city that seems peculiarly fitted for dwellings. Following the shore of the lake (Sutter Lake,) which in times of high water is an arm of the river, you come to a verdant spot, overgrown with bushes, but laid out into streets, with the lots fenced in. Here are already quite a number of tasteful cottages, with families occupying them, or they are ready for them when they arrive. The east end of the lake is bounded by a low thicket of trees and vines, furnishing a refreshing green for the eye to repose on, while farther to the east the veiw, now that the haze of summer shuts out the distant mountains, is a boundless prairie. In the north-east a line of trees stretches away to a point marking the course of the American river. Now it is twelve o'clock; gongs, triangles, and bells, announce the dinner, and a thousand hungry men sit down to eat, without homes and family endearments. They eat what they know not who prepared, or on what part of the earth it grew—for all parts have contributed to the store.

The emigrants are coming in fast from the Plains, and they represent the distress as very great. They have been led, from the representations made last year, into the opposite extreme, and did not supply themselves sufficiently with provisions. The consequence is, that they are starving along the road. Parties are going out to their relief in great numbers—some with gifts contributed by the humane, and some to relieve them of what money they have.

"CHURCH AND STEAMBOAT."

Under this title, the Independent of week before last contained an article by Rev. H. W. Beecher, giving some incidents of his recent voyage from Liverpool by the steamer Asia, and reviewing the rules of the British and North American Steamship Company in relation to religious services on board their ships. In the Independent of last week, we find cards from Mr. E. Cunard, Jr. and Capt. Judkins, in which they attempt to justify the rule in question, and to show that Mr. Beecher has misrepresented the facts in the case; to which is appended a statement by Mr. Beecher, and certificates from several individuals who were on board, to sustain the positions he has taken. We copy the conclusion of Mr. Beecher's article, in which the gist of the matter will be found:—

"I am now done with you, gentlemen, in so far as the newspapers are concerned. I know perfectly well, and you know perfectly well, both of you, that the facts which I have stated, and the charges which I have made, will be very much to your personal prejudice and to the damage of the reputation of your steamers. Why, then, since the door is open, do you not, if I am a false witness, convict me of it? I have said that Mr. Cunard, the agent of tha Company, declared that the rule was that the Episcopal service only was allowed on his steamers, and that the captain or an Episcopal clergyman alone must officiate; I have declared that on the recent trip of the Asia, with nine clergymen on board, there was no preaching at all allowed the first Sabbath, and that on the second a clergyman of the Established Church of Scotland was allowed by Mr. Cunard, in violation to his rule, to preach; I have said that when approached on the subject he lost his temper, and beside much more, said of American passengers, if they do not choose my line, 'damn them, let them stay away;' I have said that in the presence of myself and Prof. McClintock, of New York, he had spoken thus with the additional remark that 'they might go to hell;' and I now add, that while apologizing for the loss of his temper, he did not apologize for his remarks upon the American public, but made them yet more emphatic. I charged Captain Judkins in my first article with card playing on the recent voyage of the Asia; and I now have added the further charge of notorious gambling in former trips of various other steamers which he has commanded. I stand ready to prove whatever I have said before the courts of my country. If Mr. Cunard or Capt. Judkins decline such an impartial investigation, then let the public judge which of us has spoken the truth and which has uttered falsehood."

CANONIZATION OF CATHOLIC SAINTS.—Whilst speaking of the public acts of his Holiness, says a Roman correspondent of the London News, I may as well state that, on Trinity Sunday, he decided, ex-cathedra, upon the merits of two candidates for canonization—viz., Peter Claver, a Jesuit missionary, who died two hundred years ago, and whose beatification the Pope declared might be safely proceeded with, since his virtues and miracles were clearly established; and Germaine Cousin, a secular virgin, a shepherdess, born at Pibrac, in the diocese of Toulouse, in the year 1579, whose theological and cardinal virtues his holiness pronounced to be so evidently proved, that the discussion of the four miracles said to be wrought by her might safely come on. This ceremony took place in the Sixtine Chapel, after the consecration of some new bishops, who were subsequently invited to dinner by Cardinal Antonelli, in the name of his holiness. The ambassadors of France and Belgium, and General Gemeau, were of the party.

VERMONT FOR UNIVERSAL PEACE.—The People of Vermont are preparing to send a Mammoth Memorial to the President of the U. S. in favor of Universal Peace, on the basis recently suggested at the Frankfort Peace Convention. Here is the form:—

To the President of the United States:

The undersigned, legal voters in Vermont, deploring the evils of War, and desirous of the adoption of measures leading to the peaceable adjustment of all international difficulties, respectfully request you to propose to all nations the establishment of a Board for the settlement of all international disputes or claims.

METHODIST MISSIONS.—At the regular meeting of the Methodist Board of Missions, a few days since, the Board resolved on printing a series of tracts in the Swedish and Norwegian or Danish languages. They also referred to the Printing Committee, with power, the matter of printing an edition of the Chippewa Hymn Book. In relation to a Mission in Rome, which was referred to a Special Committee, a report was submitted and adopted, unfavorable to that project.

THE FUGITIVE SLAVE LAW.—The infamous Fugitive Slave Law, recently passed by Congress, is beginning to produce its bitter fruits. It is said that over one hundred fugitives, who had been living as freemen in Pittsburg, have started from that place for Canada in companies, fully armed, and determined to resist all attempts to capture them. Similar companies will be furnished by many other places, in which it was supposed that not many, if any, fugitives were residing. In the city of New York, last week, a most melancholy case came to light. A mulatto, named James Hamlet, who had resided in the city about two years, where he has a wife and children, was brought before the U. S. Commissioner, claimed as a fugitive from slavery; two persons testified to his being a slave of Mary Brown, of Baltimore; the affidavits required by law were sworn to; and, almost before his friends knew of his arrest, the poor man, duly hand-cuffed, was delivered over by the U. S. Marshal, to be conveyed with all possible dispatch to Baltimore. If this law, which makes slave-catchers of U. S. officers throughout the country, does not wake up the people at the North to see that they have some connection with slavery, then nothing can awaken them.

General Intelligence.

PROCEEDINGS IN CONGRESS LAST WEEK.

IN SENATE. SECOND-DAY, Sept. 23.

The Senate took up, and after considerable discussion, passed, the Civil and Diplomatic Appropriation Bill, with sundry amendments, among which was one providing for a special agent to Ecuador, with a salary of $3,000; also, one abrogating the present contract with the Public Printer, and appropriating a large sum for the prompt execution of the future printing of this Congress. The bill appropriates fifty thousand dollars for a Custom-House at St. Louis, and the same amount for one at Cincinnati; also, $20,000 each for Marine Hospitals at Vicksburg, Mississippi, and Greenville, Indiana.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

The House passed the Navy Appropriation Bill, with a clause prohibiting the use of the degrading lash in the naval service of the United States, and abolishing the use of rum, except in the cabin. As the bill includes an appropriation of $100,000 for a sectional or floating Dry Dock in California.

IN SENATE. THIRD-DAY, Sept. 24.

The Senate passed the House bill for the payment of the third installment due to Mexico under the Treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo.

The bill making temporary provision for the occupation and working of the gold lands in California, the granting of leases, &c., was taken up and discussed till the hour of recess.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

The Civil and Diplomatic Appropriation Bill from the Senate was passed, after several amendments, among which was one allowing members $45 for the long and $25 for the short session, for stationory.

The House concurred in the Senate's amendment to the Oregon Land bill and the Post Road bill.

Preston King asked a suspension of the rules in order to introduce a bill for the abolition of Slavery in the District of Columbia, allowing compensation to the owners, to be paid out of the U. S. Treasury. The House refused to suspend the rules, Yeas, 92; Nays, 109.

A resolution was adopted by a vote of 142 to 20, authorizing the President to commence a suit in behalf of the United States against Ex-Secretary Crawford for the recovery of the interest which he received on the Galphin Claim.

The fortification bill was passed by a vote of 106 to 66.

The bill granting six millions of acres of the Public Lands to the several States of the Union for the support of the indigent insane, (in compliance with the memorial of Miss Dix,) was taken up. Mr. Burt moved to table it, but the motion was lost by the decisive vote of Yeas 48, Nays 107, and the House adjourned without further action. Should this bill become a law, New York's share of the land would be nine hundred and sixty-one thousand acres.

IN SENATE. FOURTH-DAY, Sept. 25.

Four private bills, granting pensions, were taken up and passed.

The Joint Resolution from the House, authorizing the President to commence suit against Mr. Crawford for the recovery of the Galphin interest, was taken up, and after a long discussion, in which Messrs. Dawson, Turney, Ewing, and Butler participated, the Resolution was laid on the table, 27 to 25.

The bills for the establishment of Collection Districts in California, to make temporary provision for the working of the mines, and for preserving order in the mining districts, were passed.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

The Senate bill providing for the addition of four Commissaries to the army, was passed.

The bill amending the act providing for the better security of the lives of passengers on board American steamboats, was also passed. The bill requires that every steamboat be well supplied with lifeboats—prescribes the number of passengers according to the dimensions of the boat—requires a life-preserver for each passenger, to be furnished by the boat owners, and to be always in readiness for use; and provides that no combustible materials be carried as freight, that the boilers be examined once in six months, &c.

The Army Appropriation bill was taken up and an amendment to pay the officers mileage according to the usually traveled route instead of the direct route was lost. An amendment was adopted appropriating $10,000 for the purchase of a burying ground for Americans at the city of Mexico. A wrangling dispute sprung up, in which several members participated, as to who is responsible for the squandering of the public money. The Committee rose, and the House adjourned without having made any progress in the bill.

IN SENATE. FIFTH-DAY, Sept. 26.

The bill granting Bounty Lands to the soldiers of 1812, was amended and ordered to be engrossed. The bill granting lands for the benefit of the Indigent Insane, was debated at considerable length, and postponed till December next. The Indian Appropriation Bill was taken up and discussed till the hour of recess.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

The House took up the Army Appropriation Bill, and adopted a section requiring the Secretary of War to discharge such soldiers from the service as enlisted under the age of 21 years, and without the consent of their parents and guardians. The House then agreed to all the amendments, and passed the bill.

The Civil and Diplomatic Appropriation Bill, as returned from the Senate, with amendments, was taken up, and the House refused to concur in the Senate's amendment striking out the clause for Mileage reform, viz: That Mileage be computed by the mail routes, and that no member on this side of the Rocky Mountains shall receive more than $1,000, nor any member on the other side more than 2,000, for Mileage. Several unimportant amendments were adopted, and at 4 o'clock the House adjourned.

IN SENATE. SIXTH-DAY, Sept. 27.

Ten thousand copies of Gurley's Report on Liberia were ordered to be printed. A resolution was adopted, appropriating $2,500 for the purchase of Stuart's portraits of Washington, Adams, Jefferson, Madison and Monroe. An amendment to the Appropriation Bill was adopted, providing about one million dollars to pay the award to the Cherokees under the treaty.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

The House was engaged in a consideration of the Senate's amendments to the Civil and Diplomatic Appropriation Bill. The amendment appropriating $200,000 for the extension of the Capitol was rejected. The appropriation of 100,000 for a Custom-House and 50,000 for a Marine Hospital at San Francisco, was concurred in. The amendment appropriating ten thousand dollars for expenses of the Turkish Envoy, was also concurred in.

IN SENATE. SABBATH, Sept. 28.

The Naval Bill was taken up. An amendment authorizing a contract with Ambrose Thompson for a line of steamers to carry the mails from San Francisco to Shanghai, China, was rejected. An attempt was made to strike out of the bill the proviso, "that flogging in the navy be, and the same is hereby abolished from and after the passage of this act," but it failed. Finally the bill was passed, with the anti-flogging proviso.

The Army Appropriation Bill, the Indian Bill, the Bounty Land Bill, and several private Bills, were passed, in the midst of much excitement and confusion. At 5 o'clock Sunday morning, the Senate adjourned over to Monday morning at 9 o'clock.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

The bill extending the Judiciary system of the United States over California, was passed; also the bill establishing additional collection districts in California, and the Light-House bill. The amendments of the Senate to the Navy Appropriation Bill were agreed to; also those to the Civil and Diplomatic Appropriation Bill. The Bounty Land Bill was passed; also the bill appointing three Indicn agents in California. The House adjourned at ten minutes past 4 o'clock Sunday morning.

The Roman Post Office has recommenced its rigorous exclusion of such foreign newspapers as express opinions unfavorable to the Papal Court, or to any of the branches of the administration. All the Democratic press of England, France, and Tuscany, has been long since prohibited; but though the Times, Galignani, and the Journal des Debats, have nominally free entrance, not a day passes but one or other is excluded.

The Bordeaux papers bring an appalling account of the fatal termination of Lieut. Gale's balloon ascent, on horseback, from the Hippodrome of Vincennes, in the neighborhood of the city, on Sunday, Sept. 8. Lieut. Gale had succeeded in reaching the ground with his pony, when the people who came to assist him, misunderstanding his directions, after the pony was released, let go the ropes. The unfortunate aeronaut, hanging on by his hands to a rope, was instantly caught up into the air with the balloon, which continued ascending for upwards of a mile. The next day a corpse was discovered in the direction which the balloon had taken, which was identified as that of Lieut. Gale.

A letter from Constantinople states that great sensation had been caused by the wife of Mehemet Pacha having strangled one of her eunuchs, assisted by a groom and some other servants. She has been arrested. She pretended that by law she had a right to kill him if she pleased. She was formerly the wife of an English physician, but was divorced from him. It was believed that in spite of her high rank, she would be condemned.

ANECDOTE OF JENNY LIND.—The following incident is narrated by a gentleman of New York, who can testify to its truth:—

When Mr. Macready, the tragedian, was last in this country, and with a number of friends was conversing on the Opera and music in general, he said he had always supposed himself invulnerable as to their influences upon him; that he had heard every famed vocalist that had appeared before an English audience for the last twenty-five years, and they were lifeless, powerless, and destitute of a charm to him. "But," said he, "there is one woman who can break down every barrier to my inmost soul, and it was not till I heard her that the magic of music was known to me, and that person is Jenny Lind. I was invited," said he, "by some friends to go and hear her, they knowing I disclaimed all susceptibility to the power of music, and I went. Mademoiselle Lind commenced in one of her most pathetic pieces. At first I was astonished at her flexibility and compass of voice; gradually my astonishment became admiration, until I was completely charmed, and yielding to the charm, my soul became filled with its power, and it was not till a tear dropped from my cheek upon my hand, that I knew how completely absorbed I was by influences which I had never known before."

ACCIDENTS ON THE ERIE RAILROAD.—Two accidents occurred on the Erie Railroad last week. The first—on Second-day, Sept. 23d, near Addison—was occasioned by running over a cow, and resulted in the destruction of several freight cars, the injuring of considerable baggage, and the slight wounding of two persons connected with the train. The second—on Third-day night, Sept. 24th, near Owego—was occasioned by running over a cow, and resulted in the death of two persons, and the injuring of several others. In the latter case, the Coroner's Jury blame the Company for not sufficiently protecting the road from cattle, and the engineer for not using due care.

JENNY LIND IN BOSTON.—Jenny Lind has given two concerts in Boston. The first ticket for the first concert was bought by Ossian E. Dodge, a vocalist, for the snug little sum of six hundred and twenty-five dollars. The first bid for it was $250. The second ticket brought $24; a lot of 8, $16 each; 4th, $10 50; 5th, $10 50; and so down to $9, at which a considerable number were sold; thence down to $7 and $6, at which most of the tickets were purchased. The lowest prices paid for back seats in the gallery was $1 50. All these prices are in addition to the regular ticket price of $3. The premiums probably amounted to $12,000. The competitors for the first ticket were chiefly booksellers.

IMPORTANT DECISION.—The Court of Common Pleas has decided that a common carrier has a right to make a special contract with those sending goods by him, a rule the contrary to which has usually hitherto been held. The Merchants' Mutual Insurance Company insured goods for a party at the West, which were placed on board a barge belonging to the Western Transportation Co., and burned at the great fire at Albany while on their way. The Insurance Co. paid the loss and sued the Transportation Company, contending that they were bound to deliver the goods at the place of destination. The printed receipts of the Transportation Company expressly provide that they will not be liable for loss by fire. This Court held that said clause is good and valid, and gave judgment for the Transportation Company. [Tribune.

A SERIOUS JOKE.—The Meredith Bridge (N. H.) Democrat states that a young gentleman and lady at Center Harbor, not many days since, requested Squire Thompson, of that place, to unite them in marriage, with which desire he forthwith complied—one of them, it is said, agreeing to pay him $5 for the service, and the other promising an additional compensation of a bushel of beans. The parties now say they preferred their request for marriage merely in fun. But the Squire informs them that they are tied fast, and can't back out—the marriage having been legally recorded on the town books, as a veritable contract.

LARGE GOLD COINS.—Senator Gwin has brought forward a measure providing that gold coins of the value of from one hundred to ten thousand dollars, shall be struck at the Mint. They are to be rectangular, suitable for packing, being designed for commercial purposes. They are to be struck of refined gold of uniform fineness, and with appropriate legends and devices similar to those upon our smaller coins, with their value conspicuously marked, and the inscriptions Liberty and United States of America. Counterfeiting and mutilation are provided against by suitable contrivances and penal enactments.

THE ARCTIC EXPEDITION.—The schooner Isabella, which arrived at Newburyport, Sept 25, heard that some Esquimaux, Indians had picked up a cask inside of which was a tin canister containing papers which were brought into India Harbor to Capt. Norman's trading post about the 20th July. The papers were said to contain information relative to the expedition of Sir John Ross, but the nature of the information Capt. Dodge could not learn as they were sent to Sandwich Bay under seal, to be shipped to England by the schooner Escort, of London, bound home with salmon and furs.

SUMMARY.

The Dunkirk Journal says: "The work on this end of the Western Division of the New-York and Erie Railroad is rapidly progressing, and we are informed by those who have lately passed over the line from Hornellsville, that the whole work is in a forward state, and that every indication is now favorable to its final completion by the first of May next, the time set by the Company. From this place east, several miles of iron are already laid, and the superstructure of about ten miles more will be ready for the iron during the Fall." We understand there are 5,000 men at work between Hornellsville and Dunkirk.

The Indiana Herald of Sept. 21st says:—John M. Daniels or John McDaniels, some years since a resident of the State of New-York, died about six months since at this place, leaving an estate valued at about $12,000. It is presumed that the heirs to this estate are now living somewhere in the State of New-York, and most probably in Chenango Co., and that it will be an easy matter for them to become lawfully possessed of the same.

The Schoharie (N. Y.) Patriot says that Mr. Francis Becroft, who resides with his son Jacob Becroft, near Fox Creek Bridge, entered upon the 101st year of his age in July last. She was captured in Africa when young, and brought to this country and enslaved.

A dispatch dated at Pittsburg, Pa., Sept. 24th, says that great excitement prevails there among the colored population, on account of the recent passage in Congress of the Fugitive Slave Bill. A few miles from this village, says the Roslyn (L. I.) Planter, is a fine and well appointed place, near the entrance to which, a sign in large letters informs the world that "This place is for SAL." We would recommend the young lady, thus unceremoniously alluded to, to call and take possession. Whether Sal is a daughter of the owner of the place, and this sign is held out as an inducement for stray young gentlemen in search of wives, we cannot say, but it looks suspicious.

The Lockport Democrat says that a great foot race came off at Hartland, Niagara County, on the 31st ult. between the Tonawanda and Chippewa Indians. The distance run was ten miles without stopping. The first two miles were performed in nine minutes and thirty-two seconds—the last two in 12 minutes fifteen seconds. Several fine specimens of Plumbago, or Black Lead, have been recently discovered in Connecticut, near the Housatonic Railroad. The vein is said to be four feet wide and very rich. A practical miner estimates that it will yield two or three tuns per day, worth from $80 to $150 per tun, at a cost not exceeding $10 per tun, giving a very large profit to the operators.

It is said that a superb silver flagon is to be presented by the Mechanics and Brewers of this City to the workmen of Messrs. Barclay & Perkins's Brewery in London, in commemoration of "their heroic conduct in chastising the Butcher Haynau." The flagon is to be of large size, embossed with a view of the chastisement on one side, and with a suitable inscription on the other.

The success of the missionary effort on the Points in New York continues to be most gratifying. More than 400 persons have signed the Pledge, and comfortable homes and steady work have been furnished to more than one hundred. A temperance grocery has been started on the site of one of the worst grog shops of the Points.

There are five sisters in Cambridge, near Boston, who can only sing when in the mesmeric state, and then they are said to sing with great sweetness and power. The Boston Journal says: "Their music while in the state of trance, induced by Dr. Cutter, is superior to any thing we have ever heard in the normal state."

A fire broke out in the Mount Vernon House, village of Mount Vernon, Maine, on the 25th ult., which spread with great rapidity, destroying in its course 15 buildings, including every store in the place, the Post Office, Dr. Ting's office, Blossom's tavern, with stable and other buildings, and several dwelling houses.

We understand, says the Little Rock Democrat, a company is mining for Lead, in the Choctaw Nation, about six miles west of the Arkansas boundary line, and about opposite the center of Polk county. The mineral contains a large per centage of silver. The prospects of the company are said to be very flattering.

Miscellaneous.

THE CHILD AND THE SCEPTIC.

A little girl was sitting beside a cottage-door,
And with the Bible on her knee, she conned its pages o'er,
When by there passed a traveler, that sultry summer day,
And begged some water and a seat, to cheer him on his way.

"Come in, sir, pray, and rest awhile," the little maiden cried,
"To house a weary traveler, is mother's joy and pride."
And while he drank the welcome draught and chatted merrily,
She sought again the cottage door, the Bible on her knee.

At length, refreshed, the traveler—a sceptic he—uprose:
"What! reading still the Bible, child?—your lesson, I suppose?"
"No lesson, sir," the girl replied; "I have no task to learn;
But often to these stories here with joy and love I turn."
"And wherefore do you love that book, my little maid, I pray,
And turn its pages o'er and o'er the livelong summer day?"
"Why love the Bible, did you ask?—how angry, sir, you look!
I thought that every body loved this holy, precious book."

The sceptic smiled, made no reply, and pondering traveled on,
But in his mind her answer still rose ever and anon;—
"I thought all loved the holy book,"—it was a strange reply;
"Why do not I, then, love it too?" he whispered with a sigh.

He mused, resolved, examined, prayed; he looked within, above;
He read, acknowledged it, the truth, and worshiped Him, the love.
A nobler life, from that same hour, the sceptic proud began,
And lived and labored many a year, a Bible-loving man.

The Strife of Art and Skill.

Mr. Lester's "Fly-Leaf of Art and Criticism," attached to the covers of the Gallery of Illustrious Americans," contains a sketch of the history of Charles L. Elliott, the portrait painter. Mr. Elliott was a native of Auburn, N. Y. The circumstances that "made him a painter," are thus finely narrated:—

"His father was an architect of great mechanical genius, and many of the 'principal men' of the village were indebted to his taste and skill for their imposing mansions, which drew the attention of travelers as they passed. Like all good fathers who can, he sent his boy regularly to the district school. He also had, at a very early period, displayed a taste for mechanism, and most of his leisure hours and holidays were spent in his father's workshop, from which he sent forth sleds, wagons, windmills, and sawmills, of many different sizes, but of beautiful workmanship, which gave him the reputation of being the most consummate operator of this kind in the village. But a dangerous rival had appeared in the school, who threatened by his skill as a draughtsman of horses—on the slate—to eclipse the fame of the hitherto unrivaled constructor. But this artist's genius seemed to have a rather limited range, since he always made the same horse; although, by dint of practice, he succeeded in representing that animal in a very commendable state. The versatility of his talent, however, was not brought in question by the critics, and he was luxuriating in the wealth of his fame. The architect's son began at last to feel the stirrings of envy, and he secretly resolved to distance his rival on his own field. He collected all the pictures of horses he could lay his hands on, and began his studies on the slate. All the common observer, however, could make out of his first efforts, were oblong bodies, with four uprights, each evidently intended to represent horses' legs; but he gradually improved, until, with all his drawings on the slate, he began to draw on his rival. Not yet satisfied, however, with his success, he kept his secret, and obstinately persevered, trying his subject in one position for a few days, and then in another; but still he was not satisfied with his efforts. At last he cast aside his picture-models, and began to study from life. He watched horses as they passed in the streets; went to the stables to examine their limbs and proportions; but still he found it no easy matter to draw a good horse. 'Why is it,' thought he, 'that I cannot make one horse in a month, when that fellow can make fifty in a day?' The mystery was not solved for many years, and its solution opens, in fact, the whole domain of art. Long afterwards he discovered that, while his rival had by mere dint of practice, succeeded in copying a horse standing still, without action or life, and succeeded at last commendably well, he had done it only as a mechanic; while he himself went to work on his ideal, which was a horse in motion, in any attitude; for he supposed one attitude as easy as another. He had, unbeknown to himself, begun to draw as an artist. He made the horse his study, and not any particular horse in any particular attitude. The difference was as great between his attempt and his rival's, as between the dunce who learns to repeat the first lines of the Ænead, and the scholar who reads Tacitus with delight, and Horace with enthusiasm. The one was overcoming only the difficulties of resembling a stiff, hard, unyielding form; the other was learning principles of art, which would make him master of all forms. But the poor boy knew not that he had begun as Giotto began—to learn to draw the forms of the sheep he watched on the sunny slopes of the Tuscan hills—to represent life by lines without color or shadings. He was out of patience with himself for his stupidity! Long afterward he learned that he had lost his patience because he could not do, in his tenth year, what cost the old masters so much toil.

"But he perceived in his studies a light beginning to break on his path. Gleam after gleam shone brightly from his pencil, and he could draw a horse standing at a post, or chafing under the spur, with swollen veins, snorting nostrils, and prancing feet. At last it mattered little to him what his horse must do. He could make him do one thing as well as another. He had passed the Rubicon of art, although he knew little what he had really done; but judging of himself as he judged his of rival, he thought his horse could pass muster. Having now, as patiently as he could, endured the reproach of defeat for several weeks, the time which he had bided at last came.

"One evening he drew a fine prancing horse, full of mettle, with flowing tail and mane, and laid his slate up carefully on the kitchen mantel-piece and went to bed. All night long squadrons of prancing horses danced in his vision. The next morning he took down the slate, and hurrying off to the school-house before the usual hour, showed his drawing to one of his little friends who had taken his part from the beginning, and privately asked him how he liked it. The noble little urchin's eyes—we have always had a liking for that boy since we heard the story—grew as large as saucers—tiny ones. He could hardly trust his senses. He gazed intently on the picture, seized the slate, and when he could contain himself no longer rushed across the school-room, and thrusting it triumphantly into the face of the still-horse boy, said, 'There, old fellow, make a horse like that; you cannot do it, no way you can fix it.' There was no retreat. He was in the list with his rival. He was to have one day to copy the prancing horse. He tried and failed. 'Well,' said the hitherto unrivaled draughtsman of still-horses, 'now let him try my horse. I cannot do his'n, and he cannot do mine.' This, too, was fair play. His antagonist asked a day, and he would try. He did it during the ten minutes the school were at play. At noon the still horse was shown. It was declared to be perfect, on the confession of the still-horse boy himself. Thus ended the conflict! and after that day young ELLIOTT had as many horses to draw as he had before made sleds, and wagons, and windmills. We have told the story, in all its minuteness, for it is a miniature picture of the artist. We find its original in the stories of painters and sculptors, wherever we read them."

Free Schools in New York.

The following letter from a champion of Free Schools to a Trustee of the Corning Union School, deserves to be read and pondered by every voter in the State of New York.

Secretary's Office, Department of Common Schools,
ALBANY. Aug. 28, 1850.

DEAR SIR,—I apprehend there can be no reasonable doubt that the people of the State, at the approaching Election will sustain the principle of Free Schools, by a clear and decided majority against the repeal of the existing law.

I sincerely trust the friends of universal education will leave no effort untried to sustain this noble principle. Upon their faithful exertions everything will depend. It is from apathy alone that we have anything to fear. The official returns of the Department will show an accession during the present year of upwards of One Hundred Thousand Children to our Common Schools beyond the number heretofore embraced. This fact alone should be decisive of the contest; and I could wish it were generally known and understood. The intellectual and moral culture of 100,000 souls, it does seem to me, should outweigh every paltry consideration of mere pecuniary interest. Every true friend to the lasting welfare and permanent improvement of his kind, should rally to the rescue of this vast army from ignorance and its disastrous results. By our action this fall we virtually exclude from, or admit to, the blessings of Education, One Hundred Thousand of the Youth of our State.

Where are the clergy, and christians of every denomination, at this momentous crisis? Every pulpit in the land should resound on this great theme in tones which should carry conviction to the most unthinking and selfish. "Inasmuch as ye have done it to one of the least of these my brethren, ye have done it unto me," and here are One Hundred Thousand "little ones" appealing to us for the bread of life.

The deep interest I feel in this subject has extended this epistle to greater length than I intended, but I would that I could embue every elector of the Empire State with tenfold earnestness and devotion to this hallowed cause. Yours respectfully,

S. S. RANDALL,
Dep. Supt. Common Schools.

Education of Idiots.

We find in the Gazette, published at Northampton, a sketch of the very interesting remarks of Mr. Richards, Superintendent of the Idiot Asylum in Boston, at the recent meeting of the American Institute. We give them below that our readers may see how admirably this new system of instructing idiots begins to work. But a few years since the idiot was deemed hopelessly beyond the reach of intellectual effort:—

"This institution, he said, commenced in October, 1848, and was mostly supported by the State. There were now fifteen children under treatment. The average number for this year, thirteen. Three of the number never walked, or even crept. One of the three, a boy five years old, had been accustomed to lie during the whole day, unable to help himself. Now he was able to go about the house, and to climb a ladder. Two of them had their hands and feet paralyzed; one of whom, 13 years of age, had never gone up or down stairs without creeping. Now they could walk. All were very weak and feeble when they came to the institution. Most of them had only been able to sit in rocking-chairs.

"His first step was to get their confidence—never giving them cause to distrust him. He was able to succeed in from three weeks to four months. He then gradually developed their physical capabilities. They bathed and exercised every day. He had never administered twenty cents' worth of medicine.

"There were only two very small or deformed heads among the patients. One was so small that he could span it with his two thumbs and fingers. He can now read to some extent, and understand many hundred things, of which he was before entirely ignorant. To show how he managed this boy, Mr. Richards said, at first he could only roll a cent. Mr. R. got down on the floor with him, and would seem not to know how to do it, and get the boy to show him how to roll the cent; and so in regard to other things. He could now read and speak sentences.

"The second boy had been under treatment about four months. Like the other he was helpless. In order to learn him to walk he put one of his own fingers in one hand of the boy, taking care to close the boy's fingers round his own. He then signified that he wanted the boy to lead him. He then stepped a little, and looked as if for approbation, but Mr. R. took no notice of him. He then stepped a little further, and looked again; but still Mr. R. paid no attention. He then started and went clear across the room, at which Mr. R. applauded him, which pleased him very much.

"Mr. Richards mentioned the case of a boy, a native of Easthampton, who was picked up in Northampton by Rev. Mr. Crane, and placed in the institution. The boy was about 11 years old. He was physically well, but at school the instructor could teach him nothing—not even the most simple thing. He had since been returned and is now doing well in one of the schools."

Northern Wisconsin.

We have received, says the St. Louis Intelligencer, the first number of a paper published by Messrs. Seaton & Johnson, at Willowriver, a town on the eastern shore of Lake St. Croix, in Wisconsin.

Willowriver is the seat of justice of St. Croix county, Wisconsin, and is found at the respectable distance of seven hundred and ninety-seven miles north of St. Louis. We do not know much of the character of the population, nor of its numbers, nor of the quality of the soil in that remote Northern country; but so far as the St. Croix Inquirer throws any light on these subjects, they make a favorable show.

For instance, a writer in the Inquirer, complaining of the inadequancy of the mail facilities at Willowriver, says that a mail route by that point, would run through "the most beautiful part of the State, and the best adapted for farming and lumbering of any part of the Western country." At a meeting of citizens at the falls of St. Croix, 36 miles above Willowriver, an association was formed, whose object is to suppress the sale of spirituous liquors to the Indians, and to dissuade all dealers in intoxicating drinks from its further introduction into the country.

And the Inquirer gives the following editorial notice of the crops in that region: "On both sides of the St. Croix, the farmers are gathering an abundant harvest—a fair remuneration for their honest toil. Col. Greely, on the West or Minnesota side of the Lake, has harvested his winter wheat, and rye, which has a stout growth, well filled and free from rust. Mr. Foster, also, on the east or Wisconsin side of the Lake, on the Kinnekinnick, has harvested his winter wheat, which we saw in the field, and is very good. The eight-rowed New York Corn is out of the way of the frost, long ears and well filled. The Ohio yellow dent is also ripening fast, much of it is already fit to grind. P. D. Aldrich has 8 acres of the white dent, which is now getting hard although planted as late as the 25th of May, in Willowriver, one mile from the village, which will yield from 45 to 50 bushels per acre. The field will average 11 feet in hight. The crops on Point Douglass, M. T., are very promising. Oats have been harvested that will yield 45 bushels per acre. Buckwheat and potatoes yield well; and all kinds of vegetables are abundant."

We find, also, in the columns of the Inquirer, many notices of merchants, lawyers, grocers, doctors, mechanics, lumbermen and tradesmen, and the cuts of five steamboats puffing away and giving token of the business energies of those Northern people.

It will seem strange to all of our readers to be told that the kingdom of Great Britain lies farther North than any portion of Minnesota territory, or of Wisconsin. Yet such is the fact. England, Ireland, Scotland, Holland, Denmark, Saxony, Poland, and much of Russia, lies in much higher latitudes than Minnesota and Wisconsin, as will be seen by reference to any map. It will readily be granted, then, that there is no natural impediment in the way of our young Northern neighbors.

Model Lodging Houses and Bathing House in London.

From a London letter in the Philadelphia Bulletin.

Now for the new "home." The one I visited is a large new brick building, near one of the worst parts of London, but placed on higher ground and in comparatively pure air. We entered and found it was built on three sides of a square—the open space being left as a play-ground for the children, and a place for drying clothes; and a fourth side being shut in by a high wall. Every one who knows how difficult it is even for the rich to find a healthy, safe place in a city for their children to play in, will appreciate the advantage of this. Around the three interior sides ran covered galleries, which served as very good places for the children to run about in, in wet weather, and were used as passage ways to the different rooms. The first row of rooms we entered on the ground floor, were mechanics' shops, all dry and convenient, designed for the machanics lodging in the house. Then came the bath-rooms for hot or cold water, and a larger room with conviences for washing and ironing; all intended for the lodgers in the house. On the second floor the apartments for families begin. And very comfortable they are. The floors are of asphalte, to prevent dampness ascending. The walls, and every part of them, are as much as possible made fire-proof; the beams, whenever used, being laid in fire-proof cement, and the floor resting on brick arches. The passage-ways outside too, are mostly of slate. Each family is allowed two rooms and a pantry. The sitting room or kitchen, is furnished with a good cooking range and oven; and the pantry has a safe for provisions and divers other conveniences, known to house keepers. The bed room, as indeed is true of all the rooms, is furnished with excellent means of ventilation. Fuel is sold by the Company to the lodgers at the wholesale price; and gas will soon be burnt through the building. We examined several of the different sets of apartments, and found them certainly most pleasant and convenient. I fell into something of a conversation with one woman about the new "lodging house." She liked it all very much—said the great reason why she and her husband came, was to have a dry healthy place for "the children," and she believed all the lodgers liked it very much, "though some did complain that the flooring (the asphalte) dusted the carpets!"

Each family pays only from 4s to 7s a week for all these conveniencies. This lodging house was designed for families alone. There are still others for single men, with even greater conveniences. I went over the one in St. Giles, which has not only all the arrangements mentioned above—the bath and wash house and safe for each individual—but a public kitchen and coffee-room, some 33 feet long. The dormitories, of course, in this house, would be smaller, and in a different arrangement from those for families They are equally clean, however, and well ventilated. Each one is provided with a bed, chair and clothes box. In one part of the house, too, is a small library for the inmates. The rent of all this is only 2s 4d a week, or at the rate of 4d a night, which is lower than the price at the dirtiest boarding houses in the city. There is another lodging house for single men in another part of the city, even more comfortable than this, with a better coffee-room and a reading room supplied with papers—all at nearly the same rate. I was pleased to see among the "regulations" of these establishments, that there was daily religious exercises which the lodgers could attend, if they chose, and that all spirituous liquors were excluded from the house, though of course that necessary of life, English beer, was admitted. All these establishments are doing well. Both the two last, though with over a hundred dormitories each, are almost constantly full, and yielding a fair interest on the capital invested.

The bath and wash-house in St. Martin's, one of the most complete in the city, not only pays a five per cent. interest on the capital, above meeting expenses, but even is paying off installments on the original loan. This was staeted by a Parish company, the fund loaned by the Parish. There are others, like any other commercial companies, where the subscribers receive their dividends according to the profits. The arrangements of this wash-house were as elegant as in almost any bathing-house of the city. There were two classes of baths, but the penny baths were fully as comfortable, though not so much ornamented, as the other. The partitions which formad the separate baths were of iron, and the whole building was almost fire proof. The range of wash-rooms was very convenient indeed. All this, be it remembered, at only a ha'penny an hour.

I noticed that during the Summer there was an average of over a thousand persons a day, using the bath and wash-rooms. In fact, the bath houses for the poor had succeeded so well that there is one now in every parish of London. We find them also all through England, in both the agricultural and manufacturing towns. It was only the other day I saw one in Macclesfield, an inferior manufacturing-place, of no great note, where the water was brought from a canal above, and after being used in the baths, was carried down to feed the engine boilers at the station below.

The benefit to a poor population in hot weather, from such establishments as these, is not easily computed, and as I hear of their pleasant, healthful influence on the working men here, I wonder to myself at the little the American cities have done thus far in starting them.

The Tea Plant.

Junius Smith, of S. C., has demonstrated that the tea plant may be successfully cultivated in the United States. He states that the tea nuts received by him in May were planted in June, and on the 5th of September many of them were from one to three inches in hight—"strong, healthy, beautiful plants, from the original China seed, germinating so as to lift themselves above ground in less than three months from the time of planting the nuts." He adds:

"Anybody can see these plants, and the seed in which they were planted, and are now growing. No one can deny the fact that the tea plant imported from China will make itself agreeable to this climate, and grow twith great luxuriance. There they stand—those imported and planted in 1848, and hose from China planted the first week of June last, in a strong healthy, growing condition. Although the plants last imported—all of the first quality of the green tea species—were of equal size when planted in June in one field, all contiguous, having the same soil, aspect, atmosphere and cultivation; yet it is a curious and remarkable fact, and difficult to account for, that the growth is exceedingly various. I have one plant, and only one, three times the size of any other in the plantation. Both plants and nuts are congenial to the climate, and I make no doubt will grow and flourish in the latitude and climate between Florida and the State of Maine. So far as I have gone, I flatter myself that every step demonstrates the truth of the declarations with which I started in 1848."

A Valuable Invention.

We were shown a few days since, says the Baltimore Clipper, at the brass foundry of Wm. Peters, Esq., Pratte-st. near the bridge, an apparatus which has recently been invented, called the "Marine Salinometer," designed to indicate at all times the exact degree of saltness in the boilers of sea-going steamers It is well known that sea water contains a certain quantity of salt in proportion of 1 lb. of salt to 32 or 33 lbs. of water, and that, when used to generate steam, this salt is left in the boiler, as all the water evaporated is fresh. The salt, if left in the boiler, it is equally well known, would soon work its destruction. Hence the necessity which exists of blowing out a portion of the partly saturated water from the boilers of steam vessels at sea, on playing on salt water. One of the greatest difficulties with which an engineer on a sea-going steamer has to contend, is, that of maintaining the water in his boiler at a uniform density. As water will not hold in solution more than a certain quantity of salt, it is necessary, to prevent its deposit in the boiler in the form of scales, to keep the water at a given degree of saltness, by blowing off a portion of saltwater. In vessels not supplied with Salinometers, or some such indicator, the engineers are compelled to blow off at random—sometimes not enough, and at others too much. In one extreme, the salt accumulates in the boiler to its great injury, and in other cases, a great loss of fuel is caused. To remedy the difficulty, this Salinometer is intended.

Extinction of a Whole Family.

Misfortunes seldom come singly. A most heart-rending instance of this truth came to our knowledge, says the St. Louis Intelligencer, on Monday. A family called Kaufmann, consisting of five members, part of whom reached this city last week, have all, with the exception of one, been swept into eternity since leaving their home in Germany, a period of about fifty or sixty days. As they embarked at Havre for this country, an older son, who had just finished his education for the practice of medicine, fell overboard and was drowned. Three or four weeks after, the vessel neared New-Orleans, the father, Mr. Philip Kaufmann, fell a victim to ship fever. The mother, almost heart broken, immediately on reaching the city brought her youngest son, a boy about twelve years of age, to the hospital, laboring under the same disease, and the day following she and a young daughter, the only surviving child, accompanied his remains to the cemetery. Three weeks only elapsed, and the two had got to this city, when the fell destroyer again made his appearance. The mother expired last Saturday, of a violent typhoid fever, induced and much aggravated, it is believed, by her sorrows. A little girl five or six years of age, homeless and penniless, is all that there is left now of the family. A Mr. Samuel Lumsden, a worthy mechanic, has adopted the child, and intends to raise it as one of his own.

A TURKISH BATH.—A corrspondant of the N. Y. Tribune, writing from Brousa, Asia Minor, under date of April 11, says:—

In the morning we refreshed ourselves in the warm baths near the city, which have been celebrated for centuries. Warm mineral waters gushing, afford opportunity to all citizens and strangers who make these baths their daily resort. Cold streams also from the snows of Olympus permit you to have the water at any temperature. The Turkish bath is truly a luxury, yet strangers at first are reluctant to undergo it. You are led from one apartment to another, getting warmer and warmer, until the perspiration runs off you in streams, then a half, clothed Turk places you on a marble slab like a board tombstone and commences various manipulations, such as pulling and cracking your joints, pressing your body, as if he were about to make you into a loaf of bread, rubbing you with brushes, and concludes by pouring cold water over your person; then wrapping you in large sheets, he places you on a couch with a Narguile and coffee to produce the half dreamy state so pleasing to the Turks.

A MANLY LITTLE FELLOW.—When Lieutenent Governor Patterson, of Westfield, N. Y., was speaker of the New York Legislature, as is usual at the opening of the House, some dozen boys presented themselves as applicants for the place of Messenger. He inquired their names, and their conditions, in order to make a selection. He came, in the course of his examination, to a small boy, about ten years old, a bright looking lad—

'Well, sir," said he, "what is your name?"

"John Hancock, sir," replied the boy, with promptness.

"What!" said the Speaker, "you did not sign the Declaration of Independence, did you?"

"No, sir," replied the lad, stretching himself to his utmost proportions, "but I would if I had been there."

"You can be one of the messengers," said the Speaker.

AN ODD YOUNG LADY.—The late Rev. B. Jacobs, of Cambridgeport, could, when necessary, administer reproof very forcibly, though the gentleness of his character was always seen in the manner in which it was done. Some young ladies at his house were one day talking about one of their female friends. As he entered the room, he heard the epithets "odd," "singular," etc., applied, and was told the name of the young lady in question, and then said very gravely, "Yes, she is an odd young lady; I consider her extremely singular." He then added, very impressively, "She was never heard to speak ill of an absent friend." The rebuke was not forgotten by those who heard it.

LENGTH OF DAY IN THE NORTH.—So bright have the nights been of late, that any evening during the last fortnight small newspaper print could be read in the open air here, at a quarter past eleven o'clock. Last Wednesday night we were out testing, as an experiment, the possibility of reading thus at midnight; and as the town clock of Wick struck twelve, we saw to read a newspaper distinctly with the unassisted "light of day." Our geographical position is within the 58th and 59th degrees of north latitude. We therefore regard the forenoted fact as worthy of being recorded.

APPRENTICES.—Judge Rodgers, of Boston, has decided in the case of an indented apprentice, whose master claimed the right, under a clause of the indenture, to loan the service of the apprentice to other persons, that though the clause might be illegal, it did not necessarily make void the other portions of the contract, and quoted extensively from various authorities to sustain his position. The apprentice was ordered to go back to his master.

SMOKING IN TURKEY.—An American travelling in Turkey, says that a Turk would sooner start on a journey without money than without his chibouk or narguilè. The latter is the celebrated Persian water-pipe, called by the English travelers hubble-bubbles, from the noise of the water as the smoke is drawn through it. Although the whole nation smokes there is no word in the Turkish language equivalent to the term smoke in English; they say, "Will you drink a pipe," using the same expression as when they ask you to drink a glass of water.

OREGON AND GOLD.—An article in the N. Y. Tribune says that "Oregon has vast elements of prosperity, and is improving, but suffers at present from a superabundance of money and a scarcity of the necessaries of life. The Oregonians were early and successful diggers in the Gold Region, have returned with bags of lumps and dust, but their fertile fields suffered in their absence, and their harvests are yet short. With the finest wheat and grazing country in the world, they have yet neither grain nor cattle to spare. But things will sober down after a while, and whenever she sets to work, Oregon is bound to go ahead. Its climate is mild and healthy, its soil fertile, and its timber, water-power, &c., inexhaustible. There is no finer country than the valley of the Willamette, and there are very many valleys and plains in Oregon of like character, though perhaps inferior in area. We are happy to hear that the rumors of gold discoveries in Oregon are likely to prove unfounded. There is a little gold on the Umpqua and Rogue Rivers in Southern Oregon; but no great yield has been obtained from either. We trust the shining scourge is to be substantially confined to California.

DeRuyter Institute.

THE Academic Year of this Seminary, for 1850 and '51, will commence the third Wednesday in August, and continue forty-four weeks, including a short recess between the terms, and one of ten days forthe winter holidays.

The year is divided into three terms:—

TEACHERS' CLASSES will be formed, as usual, at the beginning of the Fall and middle of the Winter Terms, and continue seven weeks.

In the Common Branches, classes will be formed at the commencement of each term; but in the higher, the interest of the student, as well as the welfare of the Institution, demand that a more systematic course of study be pursued.

In Mathematics, Geometry is studied in the Fall, Trigonometry and Conic Sections in the Winter, and Astronomy, Surveying, Navigation, &c., in the Summer Term.

The course of instruction in Agriculture is thorougly scientific, embracing study and recitation in the best authors. Instruction is given in a well-furnished laboratory, in the analysis of soils, ashes of plants, manures, &c. and the modes of testing for their constituent elements. The attention of farmers who wish to give their sons a practical education is especially called to this department.

Board in private families, from $1 25 to $1 50. Many students board in clubs for 60 to 75 cents.

TUITION—to be settled upon entering school—from $3 00 to $5 00. EXTRAS—For Drawing, $1 00; Oil Painting, $5 00; Chemical Experiments, $1 00; Writing, including stationery, 50 cents; Piano Forte, $8 00; Use of Instrument, $2 00; Agricultural Chemistry, including chemicals, apparatus, and fuel, (breakage extra,) $12 00.

It is very desirable that students should enter at the beginning of the term; yet they are received into classes already formed at any time.

EXTRACTS FROM LETTERS OF A TOURIST—No. 6.

LONDON, July 28th, 1850.

The opening lines of Mary Stuart's Adieu to France were in my mind, with an appreciative feeling, as the little steamer on which I embarked emerged from the chalky gates of the harbor of Dieppe, and turned her bows for the English coast. I could understand the intensity of enjoyment which France, and especially Paris, could give to one constituted like her. I had seen enough to appreciate the regret a young heart, unsated with the pleasures of the world, would feel at leaving that vortex of those delights. But I had seen enough, too, to find that there was a Circean spell upon it. I had grown heart-sick with the blight cast upon the fairest fruits in so glorious a garden—love and trust, and all home enjoyment, withered by a principled immorality—a convention of society which accounts truth and honor to be shadows cast by a false and overstrained morality; and I left Paris with the less regret, that I felt the weakness of humanity, unguarded by all the talismans of purity, to resist intact the effects of such a state of society. A Parisian lady, herself a thorough votary of the "beau monde," said to me, "There is no honor in a Frenchman; you cannot trust them in any thing." Though not prepared to endorse the accusation in so sweeping an application, I must say, that I am convinced it is generally just. I feel that it is safer, and even pleasanter, to trust myself to the roughness and coarseness of honest John Bull, than to the refinement and gentleness of the French Leopard. When they laughed at the overstrained delicacy of American society, I thought that even the prudence of our women were poorly exchanged for the license of theirs. There must be a limit set to the freedom of personal intercourse, and as in all other things there is a golden mean. If the barrier be too close, it is likely to be the sooner broken over. It is a sound rule of policy, to put your defenses as far from home as they can be defended; but the closest restraint were better than that wideness which admits contamination.

My first contact with England, after my return from France, was the more unpleasant from the contrast with the courteous address of even the French peasant. During my stay in France, I never heard a word of insult or opprobrium addressed to me on account of being a foreigner, or any personal peculiarities; while in England, I rarely walked any distance in the street without being greeted by some rude exclamation, or a laugh of wonder and surprise at my altitude—(they who know me, know that I am rather a tall specimen of the genus Jonathan.) This I found not only in the lower classes, but in those who, if their externals were any token, belonged to the "respectable middle class." These are the characteristics which, though comparatively unimportant, first strike the stranger; and we all know the influence of early impressions in forming prejudices. England is unfortunate in presenting the worst side first to the stranger; and he whose stay is but short, will carry away the impression that this coarseness of manner and indifference to others is the true character of the Englishman. Perhaps it is, so far as the stranger is concerned—the better side of his heart you can rarely reach without in some measure identifying yourself with him or his. The traits which are noblest in him are those we do not become acquainted with easily—the honesty and warmth of that heart under so rough a shell—the love and high appreciation of the joys of home—the strong though ponderous intellect—in short, you would like the Englishman best at home, while you would like the Frenchman better anywhere else.

Pending my disquisition, you must suppose our little cock-boat of a steamer (about as large as a Staten Island ferry-boat) to have pushed out in the teeth of a south-west rain-storm and a heavy sea. The rain began to pour down immediately after we left Dieppe, and was driving almost horizontally in our faces, while the spray flew over us with almost every wave we plunged into, and at times the deck was deluged as we shipped a larger one than common. The close cabin was insufferable with so much motion, and we were fixed between the rain above and sea sickness below. Those who could, amongst whom was myself, cowered behind the bulwarks, wheelhouses, &c., as near amidships as possible. Even here we were not safe; an enormous wave swept the ship from stem to stern, wetting most of us completely. Hitherto we had comforted ourselves with the assurance, that we were not so wet as we might be; and we found consolation in the knowledge, that we could not get much wetter, and so grew quite contented. I have found that to be an optimist is a very desirable qualification for a traveler. Nothing vexes him. If he is left by the cars, he is consoled by the possibility of an accident to the train he failed to reach. If he loses his baggage, he is not troubled by the care of it, and is sure it will turn up all right. If his handkerchief is stolen, he is thankful it is not his purse; and if that goes too, he thinks he might have spent his money unprofitably. So nothing comes amiss. The storm delayed us so much that on arriving off New Haven we found the tide too low to enter; and anchoring outside the bar, within pistol shot of the shore, we lay five hours, until the tide had ebbed and began to flood again. It was then 9 P. M.; the last train left Brighton at 10, and we had yet to pass through the custom-house. It took half an hour to land us, and nearly an hour to examine the baggage, and we were yet sixteen miles from Brighton. An express train took us there as soon as we had passed the clutches of the revenue agents; but we were only in time to take a bed at the nearest hotel, and go on in the morning.

It is a transition almost painful, from the brilliancy and life of Paris—its blue sky and architecture dazzling with the sunlight—to the sombre and smoke-stained buildings of London, and the grave, business-like aspect of its thoroughfares. It seems to me hardly possible to conceive two places characterized by more opposing traits. London is comparatively a city of business—Paris of pleasure; London of intellect and utility—Paris of taste and feeling; London is the head, and Paris the heart, of Europe. De gustibus nil disputandum; but for myself I prefer an ounce of the heart—speaking abstractly—to a pound of the head. This time, however, I entered even smoky London with a feeling of pleasure, arising partly from the fact of its being the first step in my homeward journey. Not that I was home-sick, but that I was growing impatient to return to my pursuits.

☞ We very cheerfully make room for the following letter, and the accompanying Circular of New York Central College, barely omitting from the Circular the list of text-books used in the course of study, as it does not materially differ from that of the other colleges of the country. Our correspondent is probably aware, that about a year ago the question of coöperating with the Central College was formally presented to the Trustees of that Institution, and afterward to the College Association, by a representative of the Central and Western Seventh-day Baptist Associations, and that the suspension of recitations on the Sabbath was declined. The report adopted by the College Association concludes as follows: "If, hereafter, any arrangement can be effected to second the suggested coöperation, this Association will respectfully address their Seventh-day Baptist brethren on the subject." Of course the Seventh-day Baptists will wait to be addressed. [EDS. REC.

SCOTT, N. Y., Sept. 28, 1850.

To the Editors of the Sabbath Recorder :—

Inclosed is a Circular of the "New York Central College," which I do not remember to have seen published in the Sabbath Recorder. I send you this, which I cut from the American Baptist, hoping that you will think proper to give it a place in your columns. The principles upon which that institution is based are such, I think, as to commend it to the most favorable consideration of an intelligent community. Its distinctly expressed anti-slavery feature; its admission, on terms of perfect equality, of all persons of "suitable age and good moral character," without regard to color, sex, or condition, thereby manifesting its unqualified disapprobation of that spirit of caste so prevalent in our world; its system of manual labor; the high moral, and not only moral but Christian position which it assumes, while it discords all sectarian biases—all distinguish it as an institution suited to the wants of the age—demanded by the exigencies of the times.

The question now arises, whether institutions of learning, established upon such principles, supported and enjoyed by people of all religious denominations indiscriminately, ought not to supersede entirely all denominational schools, theological seminaries, and every thing of that sort. Ought we not to have a system of education which will be common property—which will be calculated to make men, instead of making ministers of a certain denomination, and disseminating certain creeds and opinions? The object of education should be to develop—to draw out into harmonious action—the moral, intellectual and physical powers, leaving each individual to be the architect of his own opinions.

But to the point more directly before my mind: Would it not best promote the interests of education, and all concerned, if the Seventh-day Baptists would unite their strength with the present friends and patrons of New York Central College, and make that institution, for the present at least, the great rallying point of the friends of reform. I see nothing that remains to be done to effect this in a manner satisfactory to all, but to make that a "five-days school," after the manner of De Ruyter and Alfred, and then First-day keepers and Seventh-day keepers will stand on an equal footing. Let this be accomplished, and the time is not far distant when Wisconsin will be just the place for the location of another similar institution. What think you of this matter? Will the Seventh-day Baptists do what is necessary on their part to bring those things to pass, or are they generally committed to a different policy?

Yours, &c.

— P. KNIGHT.

NEW YORK CENTRAL COLLEGE.

To the Friends of Education, Industry and Virtue:

The present Circular is published to make known briefly such provisions and characteristics of this Institution as by numerous letters are requested to be described by us. The College was incorporated in December, 1848, was opened for the reception of students in September 1849, and completed its second term on the 28th of March. The Academic and Collegiate year consists of forty weeks. The third term commenced on Thursday morning, April 4th, and closed on the 4th of July. The Institution, impartial in its privileges, is open to all persons of both sexes who bear credentials of moral character and subscribe to the Rules* for its internal regulation.

The principles at the basis of the Institution are such as practical religion and Christian civilization demand.

1. It is unchangeably pledged to the morality of Anti-slavery, and it will ever strive to sustain the unity, equality, and brotherhood of the human race.

2. It advocates and secures for woman equal advantages in literary, scientific, moral and physical education, that she may occupy her true position, and be enabled to coöperate fully in moulding the public sentiment and actions of the world.

3. In providing that as early as practicable the means of labor shall be as extensive, proportionately, as the School privileges, it encourages and ennobles honest toil, hoping thus to form in the rising generation, habits of industry, to render all useful employment respectable, and indeed to give honorable character to physical as well as mental labor, health to the body as well as vigor to the mind.

The Bible is regarded as both the text and test book in morals, and is placed among the classics, to be studied in our own and in the original languages without partiality for denominational preferences.

MANUAL LABOR.

This essential feature of the Institution, essential to the health, best progress and habits of the students, will receive due attention, and the best facilities possible will be afforded for the profitable disposition and application of the student's industry. In proximity with the building is a suitable plot for a culinary and fruit garden, containing ten acres of land. Ground, to be appropriated to the growth of field grains and other products, will be cultivated by the students, who may labor either on pay by the hour, under the immediate direction of a suitable agent, or, if they prefer it, by themselves on chosen sections of the garden or other land, if their skill shall warrant it. The chopping and splitting of wood for fuel—a fine grove being on the farm at a convenient distance—will furnish healthful and profitable employment for many hands immediately, as fuel will be required in the Spring term to some extent, and to the amount of at least 200 cords in preparation, for the next cold season, dry wood being more suitable for furnaces. Prices for labor will be regulated by the rates in this vicinity.

WORK OF FEMALES.

The Female Students residing at the Boarding Hall, will, in classes, be expected to do all the labor connected with that building; and although this may not be lucrative, it will be carrying out an important feature of the Institution, and will furnish considerable towards paying for Tuition or Board.

The Female Professors also reside at the Boarding Hall, and, in connection with the Stewardess, will direct in all matters that more nearly relate to the interests, industry, and government of the young ladies.

It will be the undeviating purpose of the Faculty to act the part of kind and faithful advisers as well as instructors towards all who may come under their care, and with particular solicitude to guard both their physical health and moral improvement.

ACADEMIC DEPARTMENT.

No pupil will be admitted under twelve years of age, unless from peculiar circumstances the Faculty shall deem it expedient. Instruction will be given in such branches, and in such degrees, as properly belong to a good preparation for admission into the Freshman Class.

* * * * *

Vocal and Instrumental Music will be duly cultivated, and the instruction generally varied, according as the Faculty shall think the peculiar and best interests of the students of both sexes shall require.

COLLEGIATE DEPARTMENT.

Candidates for admission to the Freshman Class, are examined in the Latin and Greek Grammars, in the Writing or Translation of Greek and Latin into English, Sallust or Cæsar's Commentaries, Virgil, Cicero's Select Orations, the Greek Reader or an equivalent, the Greek of the four Gospels, English Grammar and Arithmetic.

Every student admitted to a class higher than the Freshman, is examined on all the previous studies of the class which he wishes to enter.

No one can be admitted to the Freshman Class until he has completed his fourteenth year; and no one to an advanced standing without a corresponding increase of age.

An accurate and thorough acquaintance with the studies required for admission, is indispensably necessary in order to receive the full advantage of the College course.

EXPENSES.

The tuition in the Academic Department (Instrumental Music and Drawing excepted) is $5,00 per term, 3 terms in the year; in the Collegiate Course $30,00 per annum, in all cases to be paid in advance. Music $8,00 per term, $2,00 for use of instrument. Drawing $3,00 per term. If the student is obliged to leave by sickness, the tuition fee will be proportionately refunded. Board at the Boarding Hall, $1,00 per week, to be paid in advance, or satisfactory security given to the Steward for its payment, by labor or otherwise.

If a student's earnings amount to more than enough to pay his bill of board, the surplus will serve to discharge other bills when they exist, or will be paid over to him at the close of the term.

Room-rent in the College edifice, $5,00 per annum each student. The charge for heating rooms will be a fair proportion of the expense, the house being warmed by furnaces.

Room-rent for female students in the Boarding Hall $3,00 per annum, each student. A moderate charge will be made for heating rooms. The rooms appropriated to students in the Boarding Hall are exclusively occupied by females; males being admitted only to the common Dining Hall.

The students' rooms are furnished only with a table, bedstead and two chairs. The deficiency is supplied by the occupants.

EXAMINATION.

Public examination of all the classes will be held at or near the close of the terms.

EXHIBITIONS.

1. Exhibitions in the second and third terms.
2. Declamation on Tuesday preceding Commencement.
3. Commencement on the Fourth of July.

On the day preceding Commencement several public Orations or Addresses may be expected from persons invited from abroad.

VACATIONS.

1. Eight weeks following Commencement.
2. Four weeks following the 8th December.
3. A short recess of one week will be given thirteen weeks prior to Commencement.

By order of the Trustees,

A. H. BENEDICT, Cor. Sec.

* It is required that the students abstain from all intoxicating drinks; and from smoking, and the defiling use of tobacco in or about the College buildings, &c.

UNIVERSITY OF OXFORD.

BY DR. BELLOWS.

Oxford was, from very early times, as far back as the year 750, perhaps, the seat of some religious houses, priories, or monasteries, under the Catholic order of things. Here, too, from a date quite as remote, were established, under the patronage of these establishments, various schools. These religious establishments possessed much wealth, in lands, and privileges, and pious bequests, and, as the Catholic faith declined, they were converted, both buildings and lands, to the use of these schools of learning, which thus became endowed with property which every century, until recently, has done much to appreciate. Thus the University of Oxford is composed of 24 different and independent schools or colleges, each owing its origin to some more or less remote foundation, in an ancient monastic establishment, or else to the piety and munificence of some pupil of one or another of these establishments, whose gratitude tempted him to found another school like that in which he himself had been nursed.

It is necessary to remember, that Oxford is a city of thirty thousand inhabitants, occupying, perhaps, two miles square, of which far the largest part is taken up in College buildings and grounds. When it is stated that the number of resident students is sixteen hundred, it will not excite surprise to hear, that the college buildings are immense. They are uniformly built round a quadrangular court, and very few of these squares are less than 200 feet on each face. Some of the colleges contain as many as three quadrangles, and, besides the large courts within, are surrounded by grounds from fifty acres to two miles in extent. These grounds, through which the two rivers of Oxford, the Cherwell and the Isis, meander, are laid out in the most tasteful manner, full of shrubs and flowers, and carpeted with a velvet sward. Trees, of great magnitude and age, shade the cool walks. There is as much difference in the extent, endowments, age, lands, number of students among these colleges, as if they were in different parts of the country, and, except for certain purposes, they are as independent of each other as Harvard, Yale, Columbia, and Union. Consider, now, that there are twenty-four of these colleges, each having edifices of its own, a hall or refectory, a chapel, a library, lecture-rooms and dormitories; and that while several of them have very much more extensive accommodations than Harvard or Yale, few have less, and you will form an idea of the extent of the University of Oxford. Now, if it be remembered that these colleges are all built of stone, and usually in the highest style of architecture; that they form the most massive piles of building, with two or three exceptions, in the world; that they preserve very much the appearance of the old monasteries from which many of them sprung, having still parts of the old buildings with the chapel, cloisters, refectory, and cells of the religious orders of seven hundred and a thousand years ago; that piety, and wealth, and taste, have lavished for many centuries, their stores in adding to these buildings, or restoring them; if it be understood, that whatever we are accustomed to see in our own country in Gothic architecture most elaborately wrought in wood and plaster, is here, upon a far more magnificent scale, and with an increased richness, done in solid stone, both within and without, so that no flower that blows may not be found in marble there; if it be also considered that it takes a whole day barely to walk in and out of these different quadrangles, each spacious and splendid, and costly enough for the palace of a mighty sovereign; if it is further remembered, that there are twenty-four chapels, each a magnificent temple, within this University, and full of the most costly work in stone, or oak carving, or painted ceilings, or invaluable memorials of the past—as many libraries, too, scarce one of which contains less than thirty thousand volumes, with a common library, (the Bodleian,) containing five hundred thousand—as many halls full of portraits, by the best masters, of the most celebrated scholars or statesmen of England for a thousand years past, museums of all that is instructive in science, art, antiquity, and these countless edifices of substantial stone in various stages of preservation, most of them hoary with age, flecked with moss, or with jagged outlines where the tooth of time has gnawed, contrasted here and there with those of lighter color, and sharper and fresher outlines, but of the same primeval style, and all soft with the damp and soot of the English atmosphere; and then the reader will have a tolerably adequate notion of the outward seeming of this vast, magnificent, and glorious University of Oxford.

PERSECUTION OF BAPTISTS IN ZANTE.

The London Patriot publishes a long letter from Rev. Mr. Buel, a Baptist Missionary in Greece, giving the details of the sufferings to which the Baptists in Zante have been subjected, at the instigation of the Greek clergy. The substance of the letter is stated as follows by the editor of the N. Y. Recorder:—

The Baptist church in Zante, formed in the year 1849, is composed of four members, viz., Mr. York, who is of English and Greek extraction, himself teacher of an old-established and flourishing boarding-school for for Greeks; his wife, (formerly Miss Waldo, well known as an excellent and accomplished lady, a missionary to Corfu and Piæus,) who conducts the female part of the school; Mr. Keynigos, who holds the place of an assistant in the mission; and a fourth person at present absent from the place. Mr. Keynigos was formerly a deacon in the Greek Church. Upon his change of sentiments, about three years since, he was visited with ecclesiastical censure, deprived of deacon's orders, and displaced from his employment of school-teacher, and, at the same time, he narrowly escaped being stoned by the mob; since his baptism in 1848, he has been studying theology with Bro. Arnold, and has been diligently engaged in "teaching those things which concern the Lord Jesus Christ, with all confidence, no man forbidding him." Some twenty persons, several of whom were priests, were in the habit of frequenting Mr. Arnold's house for religious conversation and study of the Scriptures: and it was expected that three out of the number would shortly make a profession of faith in baptism. The knowledge of these facts excited the bigotry of the clergy, who on the 16th of July united in a memorial to the Bishop, praying him to take proceedings against the "Protestant proselyters." While the Bishop was preparing to respond to this appeal, the priests raised the cry, that "the Protestants must be turned out of the island," and organized a numerous mob to enforce the threat. On the 17th of July, they broke into Mr. Keynigos's house, seized his manuscripts, destroyed his furniture and books, maltreated his sick and aged mother, and so severely assaulted him, that the Director of the Police affected to deem it requisite to take him to prison for the safety of his life. He reached the boat which conveyed him thither through a continuous shower of blows, eggs, and other missiles, and amid frantic shouts of "Death to the infidel dog!" and entered his dungeon asylum, covered with his own blood. There he was placed in the worst cell for criminals, and treated with all the rigor due to a convicted offender of the basest sort. After the mob has done its worst, the police take the half-murdered man to prison, confine him in a cell allotted to murderers—a cell six feet square, and high enough in the center for a man to stand upright. Upon this oven of a dwelling, the door is locked from 5 P. M. until 10 A. M.; and there the prisoner for conscience' sake swelters and bakes during the insufferable heats of July." After eleven days' detention in this dungeon, he was liberated, and banished from the island, as the only alternative to perpetual imprisonment, and is now in the Piræus, under the protection of a Foreign Government!

Mr. Pelacussy, a teacher of English in the Hellenic school, has been caned in the streets by the mob, and expelled from his place as teacher. He is said by Mr. Buel to be a competent teacher, a respectable author, and a worthy citizen. He will be obliged to leave the country, ruined in property, without means of livelihood.

SECRET SOCIETIES.

They begin by making men Pharisees, and end by transforming them into Sadducees. To suppose that Christ Jesus, for the purpose of benefiting or reforming men, would have joined a Society like the Sons of Temperance or the Odd Fellows; pledged himself to keep its transactions secret from all the female and most of the male disciples; to receive and call the members of such societies, whether Jews, athiests, deists or Mohammedans, his brethren; that He would have listened to unconverted men, pronouncing a sort of blessing in the name of the great Patriarch above; to suppose that Christ would have devoted, or advised his disciples to devote, the time and expense called for by such societies to such ends; that He would have put on their regalia, and walked thus in processions; that He would have entered into their meetings by the outside and inside sentinels; sat with closed doors and shutters; addressed the presiding officer with the title of "Most Worthy Patriarch," whether the person elected "Patriarch" "by ballott every three months," happened to be old or young, worthy or unworthy of such a sounding title; to suppose the blessed Jesus would have met in such a secret conclave to devise measures and execute schemes of reform which are kept secret from the person to be reformed; to suppose this, is to betray an utter ignorance of Christ, his character, doctrines, and mission. Christ was open in all his proceedings; these societies are dark. He rejected pompous titles, these societies confer them. He was a pattern of severe simplicity in person and speech; these employ garish regalia and cabalistic jargon.

Christ explicitly declares, that He resorted to no secret methods of reform: "In secret have I said nothing." All the ends which I have proposed, and the means by which they were to be reached, were open, and the world's scrutiny was constantly invited. This information is explicit, and it is to the point. There were no secret societies among Christ's apostles. Cabals and conclaves there were in those days; Venus had her mysteries, and Bacchus his orgies, and Jupiter his games, and these all had their processions, their badges, their signs of initiation, and degrees of progress. But these were not of Christ, nor for Christ. Their pretended foundation was philosophy, and their professed end happiness and light. But their practical working was fraud and imposition, superstition and lust. Every idol temple was a lodge room, and every junto of pagan priests was a lodge, who amused the multitude by shows, pageants and processions; attracted the philosophic by pretensions to wisdom, and the superstitious by their mystic rites; they gained money from all classes; and in the name of one god and another, gratified the appetite and ambition of cunning and corrupt leaders, while time bore generations to the tomb, and to the judgment beyond. GRACE TRIUMPHANT OVER TEMPTATION.

Lord ——— was a man of the world. His pleasures were drawn from his riches, his honors, and his friends. His daughter was the idol of his heart. Much had been expended for her education, and well did she repay, in her intellectual endowments, the solicitude of her parents. She was highly accomplished, amiable in her disposition, winning in her manners. They were all strangers to God.

At length Miss ——— attended a Methodist meeting in London; was deeply awakened, and soon happily converted. Now she was delighted in the service of the sanctuary and social meetings. To her the charms of Christianity were overflowing. She frequented those places where she met with congenial minds, animated with similar hopes. She was often found in the house of God.

The change was marked by the fond father with painful solicitude. To see his lovely daughter thus infatuated, was to him an occasion of deep grief, and he resolved to correct her erroneous notions on the subject of the real pleasure and business of life. He placed at her disposal large sums of money, hoping she would be induced to go into the fashions and extravagances of others of her birth, and leave the Methodist meetings. But she maintained her integrity. He took her on long journeys, conducted in the most engaging manner, in order to divert her mind from religion; but she still delighted in the Savior.

After failing in many projects which he anticipated would be effectual in subduing the religious feelings of his daughter, he introduced her into company under circumstances in which she must either join in the recreation of the party, or give offense. Hope lighted up the countenance of this affectionate but misguided father, as he saw his snare about to entangle the object of his solicitude.

It had been arranged among his friends that several young ladies, on the approaching festive occasion, should give a song, accompanied by the piano-forte.

The hour arrived, the party assembled. Several had performed their parts to the great delight of the party, which was in high spirits. Miss ——— was now called on for a song, and many hearts now beat in high hopes of victory. Should she decline, she was disgraced, should she comply, their triumph was complete. This was the moment to seal her fate! With perfect self-possession she took her seat at the piano-forte, ran her fingers over the keys, and commenced playing and singing, in a sweet air, the following words:—

"No room for mirth or trifling here,
For worldly hope or worldly fear,
If life so soon is gone;
If now the Judge is at the door,
And all mankind must stand before
Th' inexorable throne!

No matter which my thoughts employ,
A moment's misery or joy;
But O! when both shall end,
Where shall I find my destined place?
Shall I my everlasting days
With fiends or angels spend?"

She rose from her seat. The whole party was subdued. Not a word was spoken. Her father wept aloud! One by one they left the house.

Lord ——— never rested until he became a Christian. He lived an example of Christian benevolence, having given to benevolent Christian enterprises, at the time of his death, nearly half a million of dollars.

There be those who are always complaining because they cannot find good and satisfactory evidence of their piety; but if their time were spent in obeying God, they would soon create so much evidence of their good estate, that it would be all around them without looking for it. Active piety and painful doubts need never dwell in the same heart long together.

"Oh! I wish I were a Christian," says one, and yet obey God he will not. This is all one as desiring that he might both obey and disobey God at the same time. If any one would be a Christian he has only to give up his own will and let his Maker direct his course.

DESTINY OF THE WICKED.

VII. We are shut up to the conclusion, that the wicked are destined to a state of endless sorrow after the resurrection.

If our former positions are well established, this is all that is left us. For, as regards the doctrine of a temporary purgatory in the future state, followed by restoration to everlasting holiness and happiness, a single remark will show that it is utterly untenable. Temporary suffering in purgatory satisfies the demands of the law, or it does not. If it does, the subject of it may claim the happiness that follows on the ground of his having fully paid the penalty of the law. His salvation is not by grace, in any sense of the word. This, however, is contrary to the averment of Scripture, that "there is none other name under heaven given among men whereby we must be saved." Whoever sing the praises of heaven, celebrate the love of Him who "washed them from their sins in His own blood." No other song is heard there. But if, on the other hand, purgatorial suffering does not satisfy the penalty of the law, it must be regarded as a state of discipline created for the same benevolent ends as the "furnace of affliction" in this life—a chastisement destined to "yield the peaceable fruit of righteousness to them that are exercised thereby." In this case the grace of Christ must be supposed to sanctify the disciplinary sufferings which the sinner undergoes, causing him to repent and to avail himself at last of the great Atonement by faith. But how, then, is the sinner saved "from this present evil world?" Gal. 1: 4. He leaves this world without being delivered from its power. Its pollutions and lusts are all upon him, nor has the love of it been eradicated from his heart. Hence, when deliverance is accomplished for him, it is not "from this present evil world," but from some state of wretchedness which is beyond it. The "faith" to which he is ultimately brought, is not that which "overcometh the world," (John 5: 4,) for he has never had an opportunity to engage in the warfare. We return, therefore, to our proposition.

That God should doom a sentient creature to a state of endless suffering, is deemed by many a most horrible doctrine; and unwearied have been the efforts to make the Scriptures teach differently. It seems to be taken for granted, by the opponents of the doctrine, that the sinner could not eternally suffer, unless God continually exerted a power to make him suffer. Hence they view the doctrine in no other light than as reflecting on the goodness and benevolence of the Divine Being. We shall endeavor to show that this is a very unnecessary supposition.

The misery which the impenitent will suffer in the future state is the legitimate fruit of unsubdued enmity against God. The cause existing, the effect necessarily follows. The effect could not be different without a radical change of the nature of man. Whoever harbors enmity in his breast, is thereby rendered unhappy; and his unhappiness increases in proportion to the strength of his enmity. Let two persons be brought together, one of whom shall bear towards the other the strongest feeling of enmity, amounting to fixed hatred. Let them be shut up in the same room together, and compelled to pass their time with one another. The one who hates will feel unhappy. He could not be placed in a more unpleasant situation. Indeed, he will be perfectly miserable, and long for the time to come when he may escape the hated company. Every moment seems an hour; every hour seems a day. He cannot look upon his companion, without having his hatred wrought up to such intensity, that his condition is, for the time being, a hell upon earth. His companion, on the other hand, may feel no such hatred towards him: he may breathe nothing but love. That, however, does not alter the case. On the contrary, the consciousness of that fact stirs his enmity the more. For the love of the other serves only to show in a more glaring light the unreasonableness of his own feelings. Yet so deep rooted is his enmity, that he cannot yield to reason; he therefore hates with a deeper hatred.

Let this illustration be applied to the case under consideration. "God is love," but in the unrenewed heart enmity reigns. Rom. 8: 7. Sinners hate God, and will not submit to the restraints of his reign. Luke 19: 14. Let the parties now be brought together—let the sinner appear in God's presence—let him be placed in a situation where he will witness continual displays of the moral perfections of the Almighty—let him feel that God is near—let his mind become vividly awake to the contemplation of what God really is, and of what he requires; and immediately the deep fountains of hatred in his heart are stirred. His enmity begins to rage; and the more it rages, the more miserable and wretched he becomes. How gladly would he escape the hated presence of the Holy One, if he could! But, alas! he cannot, and this is the very climax of his misery. Do moments seem hours? do hours seem weeks? do weeks seem years, to one in such a condition? Still it can never be otherwise. In God's presence he must forever remain; that is, he has forever before him displays of the moral character of Jehovah, as a God of holiness, hating iniquity. He cannot escape to a place where God is not.

Now, it is evident, that all this misery comes upon him without any exercise of arbitrary power on the part of God to bring it about. It is the natural and necessary result of the workings of his own enmity. God needs to do nothing more than to leave him just as he is; that makes hell enough for him. "Let him that is filthy be filthy still," is as awful a sentence as can be pronounced against a sinner. The unskillful rantings of some preachers do indeed sometimes depict the final state of sinners in such a light, that one would suppose that God exercises some physical power to shut them up in a dark prison, or to thrust them down into some lake of material fire, whence they could not escape if they would. But we maintain, that there is no necessity for such a supposition. That which fills them with all the misery of hell, is their unsubdued enmity against God. And that which renders their case hopeless, or forbids that their misery should be any thing else than endless, is not so much the arbitrary decree of God to prevent their approach to him, as the perverseness and desperate obstinacy of that enmity. Such is the strength of his enmity, even in this life, that a sinner is never found calling upon God, till moved and quickened by divine grace. Not one, of himself, ever rises from the grave of his own depravity. Let him then be utterly abandoned to himself, and his case becomes as hopeless as if he were bound in chains of adamant.

We ask, What is there in this view that impeaches the goodness of God? What is there that conflicts with his benevolence? For it is clear, that no different result could obtain, unless the nature of man were radically changed. Will any one say, that God was unkind to endow him with such a nature? What nonsense! Were his nature such that he had no susceptibility of pain, he could not be susceptible of pleasure. If he could feel no misery, he could feel no happiness. And if enmity could not fill him with misery, love could not fill him with happiness. That very sensitiveness which renders him so keenly miserable in hell, is the principle which renders him capable of being made happy in heaven. So far from being unkindness on the part of the Creator to confer such a nature upon him, it was an act of the greatest goodness. No fault need be found with God, therefore. It would be much more becoming in the sinner to find fault with himself.

But while we contend, that the misery of the finally impenitent arises naturally and necessarily from the workings of his own enmity against God, we do not maintain that this is all which he will suffer. It will be perfectly consistent with divine justice to inflict more. A familiar case will illustrate this: A father sees one of his children venturing into danger. Perhaps the child is too near the fire, and is in danger of being burned. The father's love prompts him to command the child to get out of the way. The child, in its perverseness, and not seeing the danger, is heedless of the father's authority, and at last falls into the fire, and is burned. Smarting under the pain, it cries most piteously. One standing by, and witnessing the case, says, 'That child is severely punished for its doings.' And it might at first be supposed, that the pain inflicted by the burn was as much punishment as the little thing deserved. But it must not be overlooked, that the transgression of the child is two-fold. There is, first, his violation of the laws of nature in going into the fire. For such transgression he must pay the penalty, whether his going into the fire was the result of accident or design. Then, in the second place, there is his contempt of parental authority. The pain proceeding from the burn punishes the child for one part of his transgression; but where is the vindication of parental authority?

Now, shall God allow his authority as Sovereign of the universe to go unvindicated? That suffering which the sinner experiences from the workings of his own enmity, he would have to bear at any rate, whether God had given him a command or not. And, prompted by His own infinite goodness and love, the Creator has warned him of this danger, and advised him to beware of it. But the law of God is to be viewed as something more than a note of warning. It is the expression of authority. Not only is the law worthy of our regard, so far as it is a law of our nature, but the commandment is also "holy and just and good." And if the commandment forbids us to sin, the authority of Jehovah, as expressed in the commandment, must be vindicated. We believe, therefore, that the impenitent will finally suffer, not only an abandonment, but also the positive tokens of Divine wrath. Truly, "it is a fearful thing to fall into the hands of the living God."

THE AMERICAN BIBLE UNION.—The first anniversary of this new-version organization was held in New York last week. Rev. Spencer H. Cone presided, and delivered the opening address. The Annual Report was read by the Corresponding Secretary, Wm. H. Wyckoff, and reviewed the general subject of revising the Scriptures, and announced that the work will be prosecuted with fidelity. A very able speech was made by Prof. Geo. W. Eaton, of Madison University, upon the resolution, "that the Word of God should be translated into every language among men, in just such terms as shall most unmistakably convey the mind of the Spirit as expressed in the original Hebrew and Greek." Eld. Alex. Campbell, President of Bethany College, also addressed the meeting.

BRITISH CORRESPONDENCE—No. 15.

The Sunday Observance—Mr. Gorham's Case—The Tractarians.

GLASGOW, Sept. 20th, 1850.

At several of the statutory meetings of Shareholders of Scottish Railways, motions made for the discontinuance of Sunday trains have been rejected by large majorities. At the meeting of that of the Edinburgh and Glasgow Co., where the motion was to re-open the line for Sunday trains, two of the speakers in opposition having stated that they took their stand upon the Fourth Commandment, I took occasion to address a letter to the North British Mail (one of our Glasgow daily papers,) under the title, "What says the Fourth Commandment about our sanctifying the First Day of the Week?" The question thus put has probably been read by hundreds who previously had never fairly put it to themselves. I know that the answer given in private by not a few has been, "The commandment not only says nothing about our sanctifying the first day, but by its enjoining the sanctifying of the seventh, excludes the first from the place now assigned to it." In England, cheap Sunday trains have this season been more numerous than formerly, carrying as they do large numbers of passengers—2,500 having been brought down from London in one, two weeks ago, to Bath and Bristol. One of the few English Railways that did not formerly run trains on Sunday has lately commenced the practice. From the very first, my expectation has been expressed that this is one of the means most effectually tending to reduce the first day of the week to its proper place among "the six working days;" and experience is verifying the correctness of that anticipation. But what honored servant of the Lord of the Sabbath will arouse to a sense of the church's loss and guilt in refusing the day which He hath sanctified and blessed? In many cases amongst ourselves, the Sunday, though observed, is observed as a holiday, while there is little pretension of sanctifying it to the Lord; but on the Continent of Europe this is more avowedly the case. Accustomed as we have been to French practice in this respect, the review of the fleet at Cherbourg by the President of the Republic, on Sunday week, seems remarkable. It was ostentatiously conducted. Part of the scene was a sham fight, in which 5,000 cannon were fired in a quarter of an hour. The whole day having been occupied with the review, (preceded, however, by a morning mass, which the President attended,) in the evening there was a splendid display of fireworks. The authority of God's word being rejected, neither the mummery nor the miracles of Rome's priests will be found effectual for the church's purpose. It will be found, I believe, that wherever a real reverence for Sunday has prevailed, it has resulted from an imaginary obligation of Scripture; and the more that we call attention to the fact that it is a day to which the "blessing" has not been transferred, the less will the arguments be regarded which are based on mere civil advantages.

Mr. Gorham has "read himself in" to his curacy—by observing the forms of his scriptural church. A crowd of people from surrounding places had assembled in expectation of something exciting; but little allusion was made to the peculiar circumstances of the case. The discourse was chiefly an exhortation to the duty of adherence to Scripture. But, remarkably enough, the first duty he has been called to perform by his diocesan is one in discharging which he will be directly at variance with the Bishop. The usual circular to the clergy calls him to prepare the children for "confirmation." With the decision of Courts, superior even to the Bishop of Exeter, in his favor, it may be presumed that in such a case Mr. Gorham will scarcely refrain from expressing what his superior would call heresy—although the Bishop, in his letter to the Church wardens of the parish, when charging them to take upon themselves the office of spies upon their pastor, had signified his expectation that that heresy would not readily be given utterance. Did it relate to many other men, it would not readily find credit, that one who had been so signally beaten should venture into the same field. But it is stated that the Bishop has refused to license the appointment of the Rev. George Bellamy to the office of Assistant Curate to Charles Chapel, Plymouth, to which he has been appointed, on the ground of his holding opinions identical with those of Mr. Gorham on the subject of baptismal regeneration. A voluminous correspondence between the parties is said to have taken place. Some months ago there was a report of a similar case in another diocese, but I have not observed any more recent reference to it.

Meanwhile, the tendency of the Tractarian Doctrines is made more and more manifest in the continued announcement of perversions to the Church of Rome. Of these, Viscount Fielding, M. P., who presided over one of the meetings of the Tractarians held in London in July last, to consider what should be done in consequence of the decision by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, is one of the recent cases. Practically do these parties make evident the effect of the doctrines taught; so that, if others still remain in office, teaching still the same, the suspicion not unnaturally arose that, if not detained in their present place by desire of the emoluments, they must be acting the part of decoys. Not a few are enriched by the wealth of the English hierarchy, whose allegiance is truly given to Rome, and whose talents and influence are employed in seducing those they profess to teach.

J. A. BEGG.

AMERICAN MISSIONARY ASSOCIATION.

The Fourth Annual Meeting of this Association was held at Rochester, N. Y., September 24th and 25th, Hon. William Jackson, of Massachusetts, presiding. The income the past year was $25,159 56, being an increase of $3,176 66 over the previous year. There are 257 life members, 125 of them added the year just closed. The whole number of Foreign Missions is five, stations, ten, ordained Missionaries twelve, whole number of Foreign Missionaries and Assistants, including seven under appointment, fifty-one. In addition the Association has sustained, in whole or in part, twenty-three Home Missionaries, a City Missionary, and two Colporters in Kentucky, to distribute the Bible to Slaves. An attentive audience listened two hours during the afternoon of the first day to the Reading of the Annual Report, and in the evening an able and evangelical discourse was delivered by the Rev. Charles B. Boynton, of Cincinnati. Two sessions were held the next day, to discuss a set of Resolutions, which were adopted with great unanimity, and in the evening a meeting was held, when addresses were made by Missionaries and friends of the cause. The following are some of the Resolutions adopted by the Association;

Resolved, That this Association, in the prosecution of its work, aims to promulgate the principles of Him who "came to preach deliverance to the captives," to "open the prison doors to them that are bound," to relieve the oppressed, to enlighten the ignorant, to abolish caste, and to elevate men to the enjoyment of equal rights; and that it feels bound to adopt and inculcate every righteous principle, which may in the providence of God be brought before the consideration of His people.

Resolved, That in the practice and propagation of Christianity, and in all the responsibilities, labors and duties of human life, the law of God is to be held paramount to all human compacts, constitutions and statutes, the law above all laws, the source and the essence of all binding law; hence no wicked and unjust enactment is to be held binding upon the conscience, and no man is at liberty to assist in its execution, or to relax efforts in the discharge of any of the duties God has enjoined, in consequence of any legislative prohibition of them.

Resolved, That no duties of Christianity are more sacred and binding than those of remembering them that are in bonds as bound with them, of hiding the outcasts, of not betraying him that wandereth, of being a cover to him from the face of the spoiler, and of exercising hospitality and extending aid to the fugitive from unrighteous oppression.

Resolved, That our warm sympathies, prayers and assistance, are due to those magnanimous men, who, in the exercise of their inalienable rights and the religion which it is our privilege to profess, practice and propagate, have hazarded their liberties, and are now incarcerated, for no crime but that of obeying God, and showing mercy to the poor.

Resolved, That we believe the Christianity of the nation is about to be tested in view of the late act of Congress for the recovery of Fugitive Slaves, which appears equally at variance with the principles of this Association, the Constitution of the country, and the law of God; and that while, as Christians, we do not feel called upon to use forcible resistance to the law, we do solemnly covenant with each other and our colored brethren, that we cannot obey it, nor any law that evidently contravenes the higher law of our Maker, whatever persecution or penalty we may be called to suffer.

THE FUGITIVE SLAVE LAW.

The principal features of the iniquitous law recently passed by Congress for the reclamation of Fugitive Slaves, are set forth by the N. Y. Tribune as follows:—

> The person having a power of attorney may pursue and reclaim the party charged to be a slave, either by procuring a warrant from a Judge or Commissioner of the United States Court, or by seizing and arresting him where the same can be done without process, and taking him before said udge or Commissioner, &c.
>
> Any person who shall obstruct the arrest, or shall rescue, or attempt to rescue, or shall aid or abet such alledged slave, directly or indirectly, to escape, or shall harbor or conceal such slave, shall for either of said offenses be subjected to a fine not exceeding $1,000, and imprisonment not exceeding six months, and in the event of escape shall forfeit, moreover, on a civil process, the sum of $1,000 as the value of said slave.
>
> In no trial or hearing under this act shall the testimony of such alledged fugitive be admitted in evidence.
>
> The Habeas Corpus is suspended, the law saying, "the certificates, &c., of the Commissioner, shall be conclusive of the right of the person in whose favor granted, to remove such fugitive to the State or Territory from which he escaped, and shall prevent all molestation of such person or persons by any process issued by any Court, Judge, Magistrate, or other person whomsoever."
>
> The U. S. Marshal, after arrest, and while in his possession, is bound for the safe custody of the slave in the sum of $1,000, to be charged, in the event of escape, to his bond. He is also responsible for his safe delivery, after the owner swears he apprehends an arrest, and the slave is given in his custody by the Commissioner to be returned to the place where he is claimed.
>
> The payment of the different expenses aud officers are provided for. The officer making the arrest is to have $5 and other reasonable expenses. The Commissioner before whom the slave is brought is to have a fee of $10 in the event of conviction, and $5 should he not deem the proof sufficient.

The first case in New York under this law was that of James Hamlet, the particulars of which we gave last week. Soon after the facts became known, a plan was set on foot to redeem the captive and restore him to his family. Eight hundred dollars sufficed to buy him, and he has already returned to New York a free man. The facility with which the law was applied in this case, has spread the utmost alarm among the colored people of the North, no one of whom can consider himself safe. Meetings have been held in various places, in which these people have declared their determination to arm themselves, and defend their liberty, and the liberty of their self-emancipated brethren, with their lives. At one of the meetings in New York, it was stated that the number of fugitives had greatly increased since the passage of the law; also, that the Mayor of the city had announced that none of his police would aid or abet in the capture of runaways. At a large meeting held in Boston, resolutions were passed advising fugitives to act cautiously, but to defend their freedom with deadly weapons if necessary. For the sake of showing how widely the effects of this law are felt, and how thoroughly the people are aroused, we place together a few paragraphs on the subject from our exchanges:—

A dispatch dated Pittsburg, Pa., Sept. 28, says: "The excitement increases among our colored population in relation to the fugitive slave law. Nearly all the waiters in the hotels have fled to Canada. Sunday thirty fled; and up to this time the number that has left will not fall short of three hundred. They went in large bodies, armed with pistols and bowie knives, determined to die, rather than be captured."

In the account of a Fugitive Slave Meeting in Boston, it is stated that "there are now between three and four hundred fugitive slaves residing in Boston. Some of them have resided there many years, have acquired property, and are respectable and useful people; yet they are liable to be apprehended and sold into slavery."

In Springfield, Mass., where there are said to be fifty fugitives residing, a report of slave-catchers caused the colored men to arm, and the Town Hall was thronged by thousands of excited people, "determined that not a slave shall be taken, law or no law."

At Worcester, Mass., where there are a great number of fugitivs, two supposed slave-hunters appeared simultaneously with the Whig Convention, and thus the Convention acted under full sympathy with the feelings of the people, the address disapproving the new law, and the speakers denouncing it without stint. Judge Barton, (a venerable citizen,) said that he held it in execration, and that no law that did away with those two great bulwarks of liberty, Trial by Jury and Habeas Corpus, could be sustained here; while the citizens generally express a determination not to permit any to be taken away.

A dispatch dated at Honesdale, Pa., Oct. 4, says: "A great excitement has been created in this community by the appearance of two men from the South, who are after a beautiful Creole, the wife of a Mr. Evans, and who, they say, is a runaway slave. If she is discovered, it will hardly be possible for them to take her, the feeling is so strong against them."

☞ In an account of the missionary operations of the Episcopal Church of the United States in China, as published in one of our exchanges, we find the following. We must be excused, if we doubt whether a church hampered by such restrictions is constituted after the divine pattern.

THE EXPECTED ORDINATION AT SHANGHAI.

A most unexpected and painful disappointment, as well to the candidate as to the Missionary Bishop, has occurred. In one of our former numbers, it was stated that the first convert to the Christian faith, under the ministry of Bishop Boone, has been for three years a candidate for Holy Orders. The Bishop proceeded with his private instructions and examinations, until at last, quite satisfied with the candidate, he appointed the ordination for last Whit-Sunday, and had made the necessary arrangements with the Rev. Mr. Syle, our own Missionary, and the Rev. Mr. McClatchie, of the Church Missionary Society. But upon an examination of the Canon of this Church on the subject, it was found that the Bishop could not proceed. The Canon required that the candidate shall exhibit testimonials "signed by not less than two of the Ordained Missionaries of this Church, who may be subject to the Bishop's charge." Now the Missionary Bishop, since the death of the lamented Spalding, has had but one Presbyter of this Church under his charge, viz., the Rev Mr. Syle; and though he could have procured for him the signatures of three Presbyters of the Church of England, in addition to that of Mr. Syle, yet this would not meet the terms of the Canon. And thus, at a moment when the Bishop is most tried by the failure of assistance from the Church at home, he is unable to avail himself of native helpers, however many God may raise up for him. There is, however, no help for him, until he can procure presbyters from home, or until the General Convention shall modify the Canon. We respectfully commend this matter to the attention of members of the General Convention.

LIBERAL BEQUEST.—Mr. Wm. Hay, who died on the 18th of July last, at Northville, Michigan, left the whole of his estate, amounting to between fifteen and twenty thousand dollars, to the Boards of the Presbyterian Church, to be distributed by the Presbytery of Michigan. It is stated that he had committed the whole of the Scriptures to memory.

RELIGIOUS REVIVAL.—The Madison (Ga.) Visitor states that a religious revival is at present proceeding in that community, which has resulted in the conversion of some seventy persons. About fifty have united with the churches, and the meetings are still in progress and continue deeply interesting.

QUESTIONS FOR ANTIQUARIES.—It may be in the power of some of our antiquarian readers to send us more particular information relative to Mr. White than is afforded by the following quotation from Cowdry and Palmer's work on the Sabbath, published in 1652. If so, it would be very welcome:—

"We borrow here the words and discourse of that pious, learned, and judicious divine, now deceased, Mr. John White, late of Dorchester, who fetches the reason of the old Sabbath from God, honoring that day by his resting thereon from all his works of creation, in this manner:—'That day which is honored by God above other days by his most eminent work of mercy to mankind, shall be the day of his holy rest to be consecrated to him for his worship; but the day in which God ended and perfected the creation of the world is the day honored and advanced above all other days by that wonderful work; therefore, that day shall be the day of your holy rest.'"

A WORLD'S CHRISTIAN CONFERENCE.—The proposal of Rev. Ridley Herschell to have a Conference of Christians of all nations, during the great exhibition of the industry of all nations, receives approval from many quarters. The Christian Times of Boston calls it a sublime proposal, and adds:—

"The proposed Conference has no connection whatever with the Evangelical Alliance. The object is merely to turn the Industrial Exhibition, which will of course bring together large numbers of Christians of various names, to good account, by making them acquainted with each other, by promoting their own spirituality, and concerting measures of a general character for a wider extension of the Redeemer's kingdom throughout the world."

AN EXAMPLE FOR POLITICIANS.—At a meeting of the citizens of Charleston, S. C., to adopt means for promoting the purity of elections, held on the 18th ult., a resolution embracing the following pledge was adopted:—

"The undersigned will vote for no candidate for any office of honor, profit, or trust, who shall, directly or indirectly, bargain, trade, or canvass for votes, by the gift of money, meat, or drink, or who shall contribute, or give countenance by any other means, to the corruption of the elective franchise."

DAY OF FASTING AND PRAYER.—An interesting Anti-Slavery Convention was held at Oswego, N. Y., last week. Among the resolutions adopted was the following:—

Resolved, That we recommend the last Saturday of this month, as a day of fasting and prayer, and that the friends of God and man, in every part of this Heaven-provoking nation, do come together on that day, in their respective territories, to pray to Almighty God that he would cause the speedy repeal of every slave law, and the speedy overthrow of that spurious and horrible religion which substitutes preaching, and praying, and ceremoniousness, for the duties and work of humanity, and which utters not one word of remonstrance at the election of oppressors, and the servants of oppressors, to places of civil power.

QUARTERLY MEETING AT FRIENDSHIP, N. Y.—A Quarterly Meeting with the Seventh-day Baptist Church in Friendship, Allegany Co., N. Y., convened on Sixth-day, Sept. 20, at 2 o'clock P. M., and closed on the evening of First-day, Sept. 22. Although not blessed with the labors of any visiting ministers belonging to churches within the bounds of the meeting, yet in the providence of God Eld. W. B. Gillett was journeying this way, and labored with us during the meeting, to the benefit, as we trust, of all who heard him. The meeting was well attended by the community, and was very interesting.

A MEMBER OF THE MEETING.

BISHOP HUGHES MADE ARCHBISHOP.—We understand, says the N. Y. Tribune, that by a brief of Pope Pius IX., dated the 19th of July, the See of New-York has been erected, at the request of the late Provincial Council of Baltimore, into an Archepisopal See, with the Sees of Boston, Hartford, Albany and Buffalo, as Suffragan Sees. By this the Right Rev. Bishop Hughes is of course elevated to the dignity of Archbishop. The brief is signed by cardinal Lambruschini, and is sealed with the seal of the fisherman, as it is called, a small seal representing St. Peter seated in a boat, in the act of drawing up a net, and having the inscription,

PIUS IX. PONTIFEX MAXIMUS.

AN ACCIDENT ON THE SABBATH.—An accident occurred in New York on Sabbath, Sept. 28, which resulted in the loss of two lives, and endangered many others. It seems that as the steamship Pacific was starting from her dock at the foot of Canal-Street, the wind and tide swung her against the pier, and the guard of one of her wheels caught in the frame-work of the pier-shed, pulling it down upon the heads of the hundreds who had assembled to see the vessel sail. Two persons were killed, and about a dozen wounded. It is a wonder that the number was not much larger.

IMPORTANT FROM AFRICA.—The following is an extract from a letter received by a commercial house in this city:—

SIERRA LEONE, Africa, Aug. 2, 1850.

The British brigantine-of-war Bonetta arrived yesterday from the leeward coast, and will leave for England direct this afternoon, with information that the King of Dahomy has ordered the missionaries and recaptured slaves at "Understown" to leave the country before the 1st of October. If they do not, he says that he will behead them all, commencing with the missionaries. Commander Forbes of the Bonetta, had an interview with the King, and the result was the immediate departure of the vessel for England.

European News.

By the steamer Cambria, from Liverpool, European news one week later has been received.

The chief feature of the British news has been the publication of decrees of the Cabinet Synod of Thurles, in reference to the Educational Colleges of Government in Ireland, which have been condemned in toto, greatly to the surprise of all well-wishers of that unfortunate country. The Liverpool Journal and Chronicle, which, being edited by Catholics, are supposed to represent popular feeling among that body, are loud in their disapproval of the course adopted by a section of the Irish Bishops, at the command, it is said, of the Pope.

At several public meetings, in different places, it has been proposed to bestow a suitable testimonial of public approbation upon the brewers and draymen of Barclay & Perkins' establishment for their treatment of Haynau. As an offset, the Times states that preparations are making at Vienna to greet the General on his return with what the journal styles a splendid demonstration of loyal devotion. The garrison is to serenade him by torchlight, and the Emperor is to raise him to the rank of a Marshal of the Empire. It is also stated, on the authority of an Austrian journal, that the Austrian Minister at London has been instructed to demand the punishment of the men who assaulted the Butcher.

Advices from Hamburgh state that on the 12th the Holstein army made a forward movement with the intention of attacking the fortified bridge across the Schyle at Missunde. The Danes were driven from their unfortified positions at Reckendorff and other points into their intrenchments. They cannonaded the Holsteiners for about an hour, but without effect, when firing ceased, and they began to retire. Gen. Willisten took possession of Reckendorff and established his headquarters at that town in the afternoon, but was subsequently forced to retire owing to the near proximity of the Danish ships. The Holsteiners lost about 130, and the Danes about 170 men.

The Germans have been occupied with the sudden and precipitate flight of the Prince of Hesse Cassel. Disputes having occurred between the Prince and the Chamber as to his right to impose taxes without the consent of the latter, and the people having obtained the sanction of the legal tribunals to their resistance of the illegal taxes imposed by the Government, the Prince found the place too hot for him and fled.

In France, the only important political incident of the week has been the discovery of the Orleanist plot, the documents connected with which, while they do not implicate any person, afforded the Paris and London press food for very long editorials.

The London Press publish later news from India, received by telegraph via Trieste. The cholera had broken out in China, and the Governor of Macao had died of it.

The weather has been uninterruptedly fine throughout all parts of Great Britain for securing the latest remnants of the harvest.

A frightful railway accident occurred on the Eastern line on the 17th. Nine lives were lost.

A royal decree has lately been promulgated, creating two Homeopathic Chairs in the Faculty of Madrid, one clinical and the other theoretical.

On the 5th of April, a band of 35 highwaymen were tried by the Council of War, sitting at Bologna. 26 were sentenced to death, and nine to hard labor. 10 of the former, being under 21 years of age, had their sentence commuted into hard labor, and the 16 others were shot.

Two Weeks Later from California.

The steamer Cherokee, with $1,000,000 in gold dust and two weeks later news from California, arrived at New York on Sabbath morning last.

The disturbances at Sacramento City seem to have almost wholly ceased soon after the first outbreak. The Squatters fled in a short time. Some of the ring-leaders were arrested, and they are now awaiting their trial in prison. A few days after the fight in Sacramento, Sheriff McKinney was killed in attempting to arrest a man named Allen, one of the leaders of the Squatter party. Allen, though wounded in the affray, succeeded in making his escape, and is now in the vicinity of Placerville. Rumors prevail in Sacramento that a band of some 400 armed men are now in the vicinity of Weaversville, preparing to make a descent on Sacramento for the purpose of securing the prisoners. The authorities, although not attaching much credit to this story, have sent spies out in that direction, and have redoubled their precautions. Mayor Bigelow is likely to recover from the effects of his wounds.

The emigrants continue to arrive in large numbers, and for the most part in great destitution. Meetings have been held in all the principal towns for the purpose of affording relief, and trains have started with provisions to succor the wayfarers. The movement has been general throughout the country, and it is probable that the proceeds of the collection will be sufficient to relieve the distress in a great measure.

The excitement against the foreigners in the southern mines has subsided, and the assassinations have almost wholly ceased. A large number of Chilians and Mexicans have left the country in consequence of the law compelling them to take out licenses to mine. The mining operations are still prosecuted with industry and success. In the Mariposa mines steam machinery has been brought into requisition in crushing the quartz rock, and the result promises to reward those engaged in the enterprise. The Stockton and Aspinwall mines have been sufficiently tested to give strong assurance of success.

The news of the death of President Taylor reached San Francisco on the 24th of August. It was received with every demonstration of sorrow, and on the 30th appropriate public funeral ceremonies were performed.

Collision at Sea—22 Lives Lost.

At 2 o'clock on the morning of Oct. 4th, the steamship Southerner, plying between Charleston and New York, ran into the bark Isaac Mead, from New York, bound for Savannah, and injured her so that she sunk immediately, carrying down twenty-two souls. The log-book of the Southerner gives the following account of this terrible disaster:—

On Friday, at 2 A. M., lat. 38° 39′, sounded in 22 fathoms water; relieved the wheel. In 10 minutes after we made a sail on the larboard bow; put the helm hard a-port; stopped the engine and backed strong, when we came in contact; we backed clear and stopped the engine, when the vessel went down under our bow, which was in less than five minutes from the time of the collision. Hearing the cries of distress in the sea, through the exertions of the crew and passengers, we were able to man three of Francis' life-boats, and saved seven of the crew and two passengers, out of thirty-three in all. She proved to be the bark Isaac Mead from New York for Savannah, with a valuable cargo. She was steering SSW, we NNE; the wind to the North blowing strong, with a sharp sea; they unfortunately put their helm to starboard to cross us as they saw us first, and took us for a vessel standing in shore. We remained until every vestige of her disappeared, and nothing was heard but the moaning of the sea.

Land Warrants.—The price of Land Warrants was very fluctuating last week, in consequence of the uncertainity whether the Bounty Land Bill would be carried into effect, and whether, if it should go into effect, warrants under it would be assignable. A Circular from the Department of the Interior sets the matter at rest, showing that the law will go into immediate effect, and that the warrants under it will not be assignable. Since the publication of the document, there has been considerable demand for Mexican Land Warrants, and holders are firm. The quotations are $120 to $140, with some sales as high as $130. Not many could be picked up at that price.

New York State Nominations.—The three leading political parties of the State of New York have made their nominations for the approaching election, and we give their tickets below.

Liberty Party.—W. L. Chaplin, Governor; Joseph Plumb, Lieut. Governor; John C. Herrington, Canal Commissioner; David Plumb, State Prison Inspector.

Whig Party.—Washington Hunt, Governor; George J. Cornell, Lieut. Governor; Ebenezer Blakely, Canal Commissioner; Wessel S. Smith, Clerk Court of Appeals; Abner Baker, State Prison Inspectors.

Democratic Party.—Horatio Seymour, Governor; Sanford E. Church, Lieut. Governor; John C. Mather, Canal Commissioner; Chas. S. Benton, Clerk Court of Appeals; Wm. P. Angel, State Prison Inspector.

Forgery Detected.—We learn from the Syracuse Journal, that an adroit attempt was made one day last week to defraud the Syracuse Bank, by forged drafts. A letter was received by the Cashier, purporting to be written and signed by Hon. William H. Seward. The letter covered a draft, signed by a Mr. Harrison, for $3,700, endorsed by Gov. S. The Cashier was requested to send $200 in bills through the mail to Mathew Hope of Rochester, inclosing in the same letter a draft for $1,250, payable to the order of Frederick Crane, and another draft for the same amount payable to the order of W. J. Harper, of Buffalo. The balance of $1,000 was to be placed to the credit of Mr. S. at Syracuse. Mr. Harrison's draft was accordingly discounted, and the money and two drafts for $1,250 were forwarded to Rochester, but the rogues were doubtless frightened, as they were not taken from the office. The Cashier's suspicions were first excited on learning that a similar attempt had been made to defraud the New-Jersey Bank.

Steamboat Theft.—All the silver ware on the steamer Niagara was taken from the boat on Tuesday at Albany, previous to her departure for New-York. The discovery was not made by the steward until some dozen miles down the river, when, upon preparing the supper table, no spoons were to be found. While the boat was passing down in front of Albany, one of the colored men was supposed to have fallen overboard, and swam ashore, but after the loss of the silver ware was discovered, it seemed apparent that he purposely jumped overboard, as he was immediately suspected of being the thief. His house was visited, but he could not be found.

Proceedings of the Mayor of Pittsburg.—A letter from Pittsburg, Pa., dated Oct. 3, says:—It is thought our Mayor has become insane. On Tuesday night he ordered the arrest of a portion of the city Councilors, and that they be sent to jail. They were immediately discharged by the Judges on writ of Habeas Corpus. The next day, Mr. Barker threatened to hang Judges, Councilors and Editors, and again committed them to jail. They were of course again discharged on a writ of Habeas Corpus. Last night the councilors met and took the regulation of the City Night Watch from the Mayor's hands. Mr Barker threatens to imprison them all, and all the Judges.

The Concordia of Turin states, on the faith of a traveler from Verona, that at a late manœuvre executed by the troops of the camp near that city the Croats, whether from mistake or otherwise, fired with ball upon the officers of their staff, and killed a captain of engineers. The Opinione also mentions the fact.

Chester Butler, the Whig representative XIth Congressional District of Pensylvania, died of typhus fever at the American Hotel, Philadelphia, on his way home from Washington.

In Philadelphia, one day last week, a young lady was killed by taking morphine instead of quinine, through the mistake of a drug clerk.

There was a fire at Carbondale, Pa., on the night of Sept. 28, which destroyed property estimated to have been worth $90,000.

The Bounty Land Bill.

Department of the Interior, October 3, 1850.

The Congress of the United States, at its last session, having in a spirit of justice and liberality passed an act "granting bounty land to certain officers and soldiers who have been engaged in the military service of the United States," the President has esteemed it no less a privilege than a duty to adopt all the means in his power to give prompt and efficient operation to this beneficent measure.

I deem it proper, therefore, to announce to those entitled to the benefits of the law, that with his sanction I have caused all the necessary forms and instructions to guide claimants in applying for and obtaining their rights to be prepared, and they are now in the hands of the printer. At the earliest practicable moment copies of these papers will be forwarded to each Member of Congress, and to the Clerk of the Court of every County in the United States.

It will be his purpose to administer the law in such a manner as to make it what Congress designed it to be, a bounty to the soldier, and not to agents and speculators.

The forms and the modes of proof have therefore been made as simple as possible, and every facility will be afforded to applicants to establish their just demands. Clerks are now engaged in preparing from the rolls on file certificates of service, in order that those who have not received discharges, or have accidentally lost them, may not be disappointed in obtaining their just reward.

The policy of this law in all its provisions is to discourage speculation in the claims of soldiers. The act provides "that all sales, mortgages, letters of attorney, or other instruments of writing going to affect the title or claim of any warrant hereinbefore provided for, made or executed prior to the issue, shall be null and void to all intents and purposes whatsoever, nor shall such certificate or warrant, or the land obtained thereby, be in any wise affected by, or charged with, or subject to the payment of any debt or claim incurred by such officer or soldier prior to the issuing of the patent."

In his judgment the issue contemplated in the body of the above recited clause of the law is the issue of the patent. Consequently all sales, transfers, assignments, and incumbrances of soldiers' land claims, are void, and will be disregarded by the Government. Speculators are therefore admonished that they can acquire no rights by purchase which will be recognized by this Department.

I feel it to be my duty to warn the frank and confiding soldier against the acts and devices of agents, who will seek to exaggerate the difficulties of obtaining the land in order to enhance their own charges. The evidence of service exists among the archives of the country. In nine instances out of ten, the only proof required will be to identify the applicant, or of marriage and widowhood, or heirship. These are facts readily proven, and therefore the difficulties will, in most cases, be merely nominal. And, to remove even these slight obstacles, and to give more full and complete effect to the munificence of the Government. I beg leave, respectfully, to recommend to the proper authorities of each county and township to employ a suitable agent, at the expense of the county, to supervise the preparation of the applications and proofs of claimants. The ignorant and unwary would thus be protected from imposition, the poor soldiers from burdens they are unable to bear, and the Government from many embarrassments which may result from the awkwardness of incompetent agents.

In conclusion, I desire to say, that great care will be used to guard against undue preferences of one class of applicants over others. With this view, at the proper time, a sufficient number of clerks will be employed to issue the certificates without the least possible delay, so that all may have an equal chance of making advantageous locations.

ALEX. H. H. STUART,
Secretary of the Interior.

SUMMARY.

In the Common Council of Brooklyn, last week, a communication was presented from Thomas P. Teale, Esq., calling attention to the dilapidated and neglected condition of the Tomb of the Martyrs, in Hudson avenue, together with a resolution that it be removed to Greenwood Cemetery. The papers say that the schooner Neptune, which left Oswego on Saturday, [Sabbath] the 28ult., is supposed to have foundered near Port Ontario. It was supposed to originate from drinking unwholesome water.

Miscellaneous.

THE PRISONER.

The following impassioned and nervous lines on the imprisonment of Wm. L. Chaplin for the alledged act of aiding slaves to obtain their freedom, were written by Rev. JOHN PIERPONT, to Geo. W. Clark, the vocalist, by whom they have been set to music:—

The prison's walls are gray with mold—
Damp stone its floor;
The prison cell is low and cold—
Bolted its door.

The lonely prisoner feels not now
A breath of air
Upon his broad and lofty brow
Stir his thin hair.

Why has that friend of Man and God
Met such a doom?
Why, while he lives, is he thus trod
Into a tomb?

Because he was a MAN, and felt
As man should feel!
Because God said his heart should melt
At woe's appeal.

Because, when a poor brother cried,
He felt the pain;
And, when he saw him bound, he tried
To break his chain.

And therefore chains are put on him!
And he must bear
The weight on every stiffening limb,
And the foul air,

That only newts and toads should breathe,
Must be his breath,
Till he shall find relief beneath
Thy shade, O Death!

Men of the North! must Chaplin lie
And suffer thus
While we're abroad, and God's blue sky
Bends over us?

Shame on the South, that he is there
Buried in Prison!
Ere long the North that shame will share,
Or he'll have risen.

God of the Freeman and the Slave!
If we forget
That prisoner in his living grave,
Nor pay the debt,

Due to that "brother" of Thy Son,
How shall we stand!
With his great flock, gathered in one,
At his right hand!

The Interior of Africa.

Of the interior of Africa but little is yet known—yet enough is known to show the elements of vast prosperity, and to prove that under the kindly influence of Christian civilization a large portion of Africa may ultimately become one of the most favored regions of the globe.

The explorations of the brave and enthusiastic Mungo Park, commenced in 1795—6. He descended into the heart of Africa from the northward, and discovered the river Niger, which had previously been known to Europeans only by rumor and tradition. His triumph was gained through perils and sufferings. He was previously taken prisoner by the Moors. Dismissed from his confinement almost in a condition of nudity, he felt overjoyed that he was once more at liberty to continue his search. He discovered the river at about 2000 miles from its mouth, and found, to his surprise, that its course was westerly, and not easterly, as had been by many conjectured, and that it emptied into the Atlantic, in the Gulf of Benin, on the west coast of Africa. "I ran along the shore of the river," says he; "I drank of the water, and returned fervent thanks to the sovereign Master of the universe."

In 1805, Mungo Park, together with forty-five companions, made a second partial exploration of the Niger. Forty-one of these men fell victims to the climate. Park and his four fellow survivors were attacked by a band of the natives, armed with bows and arrows, and after an ineffectual struggle, they were drowned in the river, into which they had plunged in order to escape from the foe.

Since the days of Mungo Park, but little information, with the exception of what relates to the Niger and its shores, has been procured concerning the interior of Africa. We will, however, lay before our readers a few facts taken from the account of an expedition sent to explore this almost impenetrable region, under the auspices of the British Government, in 1841. The expedition consisted of three vessels, severally commanded by Captains Trotter, William Allen, and M. Bird Allen, and its history has lately been published in England. On the 26th of March, 1841, they reached Abboh, about one hundred and eleven miles distant from the mouth of the river. The next morning, Obi Osai, the King of the country, went on board of Capt. Trotter's vessel, with so numerous a retinue that it was found necessary to dismiss some of them for the sake of convenience. Obi was arrayed in the uniform coat of an English sergeant, obtained from some former navigator, scarlet pantaloons, and a sugar-loaf shaped hat, placed somewhat jauntingly on one side of his head. When the questions and answers between him and the commissioners had become somewhat multiplied, Obi told them plainly, that "he did not like to talk too long." It must be observed that the negro King had in some measure the advantage in this conference over his visitors; for, in reply to their proposing that he should altogether renounce the practice of selling his brethren into slavery, Obi said, "Very well—I agree to this; but then, if you will not take slaves, you must take the other productions of Africa in exchange for the goods brought from England. We want your goods, and besides slaves we have little or nothing to buy them with." A treaty was made only to be broken.

On leaving Abboh, the aspect of the Niger changes; the banks become higher, the course of the river less winding, and its face is diversified with numerous islands. The scenery of the shores was soon found to be most picturesque—the effect of the light in that transparent atmosphere was almost magical—the air was laden with odors of trees, herbage and flowers, and the horizon skirted with waving mountains.

The expedition soon reached Iddoh, about ninety miles from Abboh. The King of this country was far more dignified than his brother Obi, and waited for the commissioners to call upon him, disclaiming to quit his palace in order to receive them. He was clothed in ample robes of native stuff, fantastically embroidered, beneath which was another of red velvet, scarlet pantaloons, and a conical hat, surmounted with feathers in the top. A conference was held with him, similar to the former one with Obi, and, as in that case, a display of the presents brought from England by the commissioners soon produced harmony and concord. The inhabitants of Abboh are Pagans—those of Iddoh are half Pagans and half Mohammedans. At the former place were seen many idols of wood and clay, and also amulets, to ward off harm, they being represented by their principal idol, who is supposed to inhabit the depths of the forest, and to be all powerful and wise. Their priests are also physicians, or medicine men. They pour out libations of palm-wine to their gods, and offer sacrifices both of animals and of men. The government of Abboh is singular. The King's son is heir apparant to the throne. But he does not become king unless, after his father's death, he is elected as King by a Council of Ancients or Chiefs. Each village of the kingdom of Abboh has its governor and judges. Abboh has a little navy of row-boats, each armed with a small cannon at the bow, by means of which a toll is exacted from those who pass the shores, and the inhabitants, who live in huts, number from seven to eight thousand.

The Mussulman City of Iddoh is altogether superior to Abboh in civilization. Its inhabitants, who are about ten thousand, live in round cottages, with conical roofs. The better residences consist of a number of such houses, surrounded with a wall. The exterior of these houses is painted white or blue. Near are plantations of maize, sugar cane, indigo trees, tobacco, and the like. Considerable industry was found to exist, in the manufacture of side-arms and otherwise. The heir apparent to the throne, agreeable to a common usage in Africa, is the eldest son of the king's sister. The king has a small army, but no navy. [Am. Artisan.

Taking the Census.

Alvin Richardson, one of the assistant marshals employed in the western part of the State, in taking the census, communicates to the Oswego Times the following amusing illustration of the facility with which a man may be misled by answers that are direct and true, but "nothing else."

"I must now tell you of a joke I had put on me in the good town of Palermo. I called in at a house early one morning—saw a young girl, whom I took to be ten or twelve years old. I told her my business, which she took very coolly. I asked her, 'Is your father a farmer?' She answered, 'He is.' 'Is he at home?' 'He is.' 'Is he in the house?' 'I suppose he is.' 'Will he give me the information?' 'I suppose he will.' I waited a while and then asked, 'Have you a mother?' 'I have.' 'Is she at home?' 'She is.' 'Will she be in soon?' 'Can't say.' 'Is she gone from home?' 'She is not.' Well, I saw there was but one room to the house, and had got tired of waiting; I spoke to the young girl saying, 'Where is your father?' The same answer—'He is at home.' 'Well, where is he?' Same answer—'He is at home.' 'Well, where is your mother?' 'Why, at home.' 'Where in the name of common sense is their home?' 'Why, just over on the other street.' Feeling rather chagrined, I asked, 'Who is the head of this family?' Answered promptly: 'My husband, sir.' 'Are you married?' 'Yes.' 'Have you any children?' 'Two.' 'How old are the children?' 'Two years.' 'How old is the other?' 'Two years.' 'How is that?' 'Very easy, sir; they are twins!' This solved the whole mystery; they were fine looking boys—she, the youngest looking mother I ever saw. It shows how easy a matter it is to be mistaken."

First of August in Jamaica.

The Jamaica correspondent of the Nonconformist writes under date of August 3d:

The twelfth anniversary of freedom has now passed away, and the freed man seems as disinclined as ever to forget what he calls his "birth-day." Around us the watch-night was universally observed, and all night long the air was full of the sounds of joy. The drum and the dance, with laughter, mirth, and song, kept some apparently joyful in their revels until break of day, with rum and coffee for their refreshments. And then, ere the sun was in the horizon, the pigs were telling aloud their griefs, whilst those they had ever esteemed their friends were preparing them for slaughter. But these were not the only sounds. On the night-wind, the well-known hymn came breathing along in sober cheerful tune; now from the ridge of hills behind, and now from the village in the glen before. All around it was a confused noise, not of the battle of the warrior, nor where garments were rolled in blood, but of joy—living, heart-felt joy; and in many instances blended with gratitude to Him who "relieved the oppressed," and "heard the sighing of the prisoner." I asked one on the following morning if he did not think there were many good masters in the times of slavery. "No, sir!" he said with haste and earnestness; "no massa like free! We had as good a massa as anybody, but he no massa like myself. Me is the best massa, sir!" It was of little use to remind him of hard times, or anything else, to damp his mind upon the subject. He was sure there was "nothing like free!"

A Forgery Detected.

One day recently, a telegraphic dispatch from Senator Dayton, notified the public of forged drafts purporting to be endorsed by him, of large amount, one of which had been negotiated, and another offered, at one of the New Jersey Banks. We have since heard, says the Newark Daily Advertiser of Sept. 27, further particulars. It appears that a person calling himself Simon D. Morfort, offered for discount at the Trenton Banking Co. a draft on Mr. Dayton for $2,700, which the Cashier said he would lay before the Board. The fellow said he had not time to wait, and requested that the draft, or the proceeds if discounted, be mailed to him in Newark—which was acceded to. The draft, it appears, was discounted, and Mr. Stryker, Cashier of the Bank, telegraphed Mr. Dayton at Washington of the fact, and received an immediate reply, that it was a forgery. Mr. Stryker had in the meantime mailed the letter as requested, containing a draft on the Mechanics' Bank of Newark for $200, and two of $1,250 each on the Manhattan Bank at New-York, but immediately sent a telegraphic dispatch to Mr. Day, Cashier of the Machanics' Bank, notifying him to stop the drafts if offered. At the same time, Mr. Wilbur, Postmaster of Newark, received two telegraphic dispatches from Mr. S. requesting Mr. W. if a letter addressed to Simon D. Morford had not been applied for, not to deliver it, but return it to Mr. S., as Morford was a forger. The letter had been applied for, at 11 o'clock, by a boy, who had an order for it written on a scrap of paper, in a disguised hand. The boy, on being told there was a letter, put down a sixpence, but, when the clerk came to the window, the boy, evidently frightened by something which he thought appeared as if he was suspected, was making off, and although hailed, did not return. By this fortunate circumstance, the design of the forger was frustrated. Mr. Wilbur returned letter with its contents to Mr. Stryker, who has acknowledged its receipt, but no trace has yet been found of the perpetrator of this bold swindling transaction.

Statistics of Russia.

The European Provinces of Russia cover an area of 99,489 square miles; Transcaucasia, 2,825; Siberia, 206,600; the Steppes of Kirgin, 300,000; the Islands, 1,100; American Colonies, 17,500—making a total of 359,524 square miles. Reden, the geographer, calculates that the number or inhabitants of these vast countries amounts to 60,600,000, among them 50,000,000 Sclavonians and 4,333,000 Poles. The census of 1763, according to Serozer and Storch, showed a population of but 20,000,000, that of 1782 showed an increase of 6,000,000, and the census of 1835 reached a figure of 55,000,000. In the European Provinces of Russia, the population averages 699 on a square mile. The most populated districts are those of the central Provinces, where one square mile contains about 2,000 inhabitants. The minimum of population exists in the Government of Archangel, where a square mile is inhabited by 16 people. Of Russian subjects there are 90,552,000 (88 per cent. of the population of Russia) belonging to the Greek religion, 6,744,145 are Roman Cotholics, 3,409,330 are Protestants, 1,604,767 Jews, and 567,320 Mahometans. The rest of the inhabitants belong to various sects, or they are considered as temporary residents and foreigners. 154 periodicals are published in Russia—viz: 108 in Russian, 29 in German, 8 in French, 1 in Italian, 5 in the Polish, and 3 in the Lettish language.

Slave Trade Abolished in the District.

The friends of emancipation will be interested to see the draft of the act to suppress the Slave Trade in the District of Columbia. It is as follows:—

"Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America, in Congress assembled, That from and after the first day of January, 1851, it shall not be lawful to bring into the District of Columbia any slave whatever, for the purpose of being sold, or for the purpose of being placed in depot, to be subsequently transferred to any other State or place to be sold as merchandize. And if any slave shall be brought into the said District by its owner, or by the authority and consent of its owner, contrary to the provisions of this said act, such slave shall thereupon become liberated and free.

"SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That it shall and may be lawful for each of the Corporations of the cities of Washington and Georgetown, from time to time, and as often as may be necessary, to abate, break up, and abolish any depot or place of confinement of slaves brought into the said District, as merchandise contrary to the provisions of this act, by such appropriate means as may appear to either of the said corporations expedient and proper. And the same power is hereby vested in the levy court of Washington county, if any attempt shall be made within its jurisdictional limits, to establish a depot or place of confinement for slaves brought into the said District as merchandise for sale contrary to this act.

"Approved September 10, 1850."

Harvesting Buckwheat.

Buckwheat requires more care in harvesting, in order to prevent loss from the shaking off the seeds, than any other crop. Some writers recommend cutting it as soon as one-third of the seeds are turned brown; others say two-thirds. If we wait for all to ripen, the earliest and best portion of the grain should be cut; and as the straw is very succulent and juicy, the unripened grain will draw nourishment from the stalk, will fill out and ripen very well after it is cut. Some prefer to cut this grain when it is wet with dew. The most approved method of harvesting is to cradle the buckwheat, and then with a rake put it into bunches about the size of ordinary wheat sheaves, and set them up without binding. By raking or rolling it together with a rake, it is interwoven in such a manner that it will stand any desirable length of time, and when sufficiently dry it may be taken up with a fork and placed on a cart without the loss of a grain. It should be threshed out immediately. It is very easily threshed, when it is in good condition. It will often be necessary to let it remain in the bunches ten or twelve days before it becomes sufficiently dried and cured. It rarely suffers any injury from exposure to rains. [Maine Farmer.

NEW AND IMPORTANT DISCOVERY IN THE MANUFACTURE OF IRON.—The Pittsburgh Post has a letter giving an account of a discovery made by a young man by the name of Adams, the Assistant Manager of the Brady's Bend Iron Works, in Clarion Co., in the manufacture of railroad and merchant bars from Coke metal. By the old method the rails were made with charcoal pig; and would crack very much and break with one or two blows. By Adams' process iron can be made from eight to ten dollars per tun lower, and of a superior quality. The process is not mentioned, but the quality of the iron produced is spoken of. The writer of the letter was shown a rail that had been put to the severest test, by putting it while hot into cold water; after which they tried to break it with a sledge hammer, weighing 80 pounds. Forty blows were given by six men alternately, and they could not even crack it. The charcoal iron of the Company costs from $18 to $22 per tun; their "Coke metal" costs only from $9 to $11 per tun. The discovery has caused quite an excitement among the workmen, for they were under the impression that the works would have to suspend on account of the low price of iron.

MANUFACTURE OF FLOUR.—A gentleman named Bonnell has recently brought out an invention by which a barrel of superfine flour may be produced from three and a half bushels of wheat. Mr. Spaulding, of Lockport, states that by the use of this new process he has recently obtained a barrel of superfine flour from four bushels of pure Ohio wheat, weighing 60 pounds to the bushel. The Detroit Advertiser states, that it is an established fact, that there is a barrel of excellent superfine flour in 210 pounds of good dry wheat, weighing 60 pounds to the bushel—that is $3\frac{1}{2}$ bushels. The nature of this improved process of manufacture is not described.

Singular Suicide.

Mr. Robert Steele, of this county, says the Parkersburg (Virginia) Gazette, a few days since committed suicide under the following mysterious circumstances: Prior to the execution of Green, which took place in Jackson Co. about two months ago, he frequently expressed a desire to attend and witness the death. His parents first discouraged his design, and finally forbade his going; but, on the night before the hanging, he left home clandestinely, walked to Ripley, witnessed the solemn ceremony, and came back highly pleased with the affair. Since that time he has been heard to speak admiringly of death by hanging, deeming it the best mode that could be devised. It has been stated that he repeatedly indicated a determination to apply the method to himself—so great was his fascination. Be this as it may, suspicions of his father's family were not awakened; and, availing himself of the absence of the male members thereof, he last week took the plow line, repaired to the corn crib, and there hanged himself! His body was found some two hours after by the youngest children, long after life was extinct. He was a young man aged about 19 or 20 years, and of irreproachable character. No cause has been assigned for the commission of self-murder, other then a morbid preference for that mode of dying.

Groaning and Crying.

A French surgeon lately published a long dissertation on the beneficial influence of groaning and crying on the nervous system. He contends that groaning and crying are the two grand operations by which nature allays anguish; and says he has uniformly observed that those patients who give way to their natural feelings, more speedily recover from accidents and operations, than those who suppose it is unworthy a man to betray such symptoms of cowardice as either to groan or to cry. He is always pleased by the crying and violent roaring of a patient, during the time he is undergoing a severe surgical operation, because he is satisfied that the will thereby so soothe his nervous system as to prevent fever, and insure a favorable termination. He relates a case of a man who, by crying and bawling, reduced his pulse from one hundred and twenty to sixty, in the course of two hours. That some patients often have a great satisfaction in groaning, and that hysterical patients often experience great relief from crying, are facts which no person will deny. As to restless, hypochondriacal subjects, or those who are never happy but when they are under some course of medical or dietetic treatment, the French surgeon assures them that they cannot do better than groan all night, and cry all day.

Escape from Slavery.

A few days since, says the New Orleans Delta, a young man about 20 years of age, went to the Police Office of the Third Municipality, and stated that when he was about 12 years old he was kidnapped from this city by a free colored man named De-Lisle, and by him taken to Attakapas, where, until a short time ago, he was made to work among negroes as a slave. The young man said that his name was Adolph Archer; that his parents were residing in this city when he was taken away; that he had a brother named Henry, and that the person who kidnapped him now resides about twelve or thirteen miles from New Iberia in this State. He further says that during the time that he was on the plantation he was, in every respect, treated as a negro slave, and seduously shut out from all intercourse with white persons, until he embraced an opportunity to escape. The story of Adolph's wrongs having been to some extent made public in the Third Municipality, came to the ears of his brother Henry, who sought out the long-lost Adolph, and welcomed him to the endearments of a home. Henry is now employed in the office of the Swiss Consul, and is determined to seek out and bring to justice the black-hearted kidnapper of his brother.

Religion in College.

A correspondent of the Boston Watchman and Reflector makes the following statement:—

The new Baptist University at Lewisburg is in a very flourishing condition. The students are numerous, and during the collegiate year which closes next week, about twenty have been hopefully born again. How wonderfully has the history of American Colleges been marked by revivals! Dr. Carnahan, President of Princeton College, in a recent conversation, informed me that about forty students had been led to the Savior in the revival which commenced soon after the last Thursday in February. Of the eighty graduates at the last Commencement a majority were the professed disciples of Christ. Of the converts in the late revival, the greater portion were from the Senior Class, so that their influence will the sooner be felt on the destinies of their fellow-men. It is worthy of note, that every student must recite a lesson from the Bible, usually three chapters, each Sunday afternoon. At first the President conducted the exercise, until the increasing number of students made it necessary for each class to meet alone, making in reality four college Bible classes, embracing all the students. In addition to this, each student recites a lesson on Monday morning from the Greek Testament. A sermon is preached in the college chapel every Sunday morning, which all the students must attend; and there is another discourse during the week, at which the attendance is voluntary."

THE TABLES TURNED.—A tavern-keeper in Allegheny, Penn., had several young men arrested, and taken before the Mayor on Tuesday last. He had sold them liquor on the previous Sunday, and becoming intoxicated they broke several articles in his house. He estimated the loss which he had sustained at one dollar and a half, which they paid, upon which the Mayor fined him two dollars for selling liquor on Sunday, so that he did not make much by the operation.

SAGACITY OF A CAT.—A curious scene was witnessed the other day in a park at the outskirts of Montrose. A cat was observed attempting to defend herself against the assaults of a number of swallows. They kept flying round about, and occasionally darting at poor puss, while she was endeavoring to retaliate by striking with her claws. Their onsets becoming more numerous and determined, the cat laid quietly down as if she had been dead, and the swallows, deceived by her appearance, desisted from their warfare and mounted into the air. Puss no sooner perceived this than taking advantage of the opportunity, she bounded off to a place of refuge. Her assailants, having observed her movements, made after her, but she had got to a place of shelter before they could reach her. What could have been the cause of the quarrel, is a question for naturalists to decide.

AUTUMN PLOUGHING FOR CORN.—The inquiry is often made by young cultivators, "When should a field of corn be ploughed?" Our reading and observation favor the following method. Plough it in the autumn, and this will afford the stubble, grass, and whatever fertilizers may lie on the surface, an opportunity to decay and enrich the soil. Spread on the manure and cross-plough the ground in the spring so deep as to turn up fresh soil, and put a small additional quantity of manure in the hill, to give the corn a luxuriant and early growth. This mode of preparing the ground is recommended by the statements found in the annual reports of our Agricultural Societies on the corn crop.

COLD WATER vs. LIGHTNING.—Mr. Kitchen, of Babylon, Illinois, was struck by lightning, a few weeks since, and was left dead, to all external appearance, but his wife took a bucket of cold water and poured it on his breast, when he revived, and is now doing well. The lightning struck him on one side, taking the hair from his head as it went along, and burning his face severely. It forked off on reaching the external region of his stomach, a branch running down each leg, and tearing his pantaloons in its way. After this escape from destruction, let no one forget the efficiency of cold water.

Variety.

A writer in California estimates the number of slaves in that State at one thousand, but he says the master has no control over them, and if he attempts to take them by force, he is liable to punishment. He says that the law furnishes no protection to this description of property; and that, to engage in a lawsuit about them, with the abolitionists to counsel and advise them at every step, is the surest way of expending the full value of the slave. In most cases an owner has but one or two with him, and he cannot afford to take up his time in hopeless efforts to get possession of them.

Robert Stephenson, the great engineer, and the projector of the Britannic Tubular Bridge, it appears by the late English papers, has been offered knighthood, and has refused it. Nr. Farraday, one of the greatest of living chemists, has also declined a similar tender. Sir Robert Peel, it is already known, not only persisted in refusing a patent of nobility, but also in his will, instructed his sons to imitate in this respect his example. The time appears to be coming when English titles will go a-begging among those most worthy to wear them.

In the canton Basle in Switzerland there is a law which compels every newly married couple to plant six trees immediately after the ceremony, and two more on the birth of every child. They are planted on commons, frequently near the high road, and the greater part of them, being fruit trees, are at once both useful and ornamental. The number planted is said to amount to ten thousand annually.

The Number of periodicals published at present in Russia amounts to 154; 64 of which are published in Petersburg, 13 in Moscow, 5 in Odessa, 22 in Courland, and the adjoining provinces, and 50 in the remaining parts of the empire: 108 of these are published in the Russian language, 29 in German, 8 in French, 1 in Italian, 5 in Polish, and 3 in Latin.

Mr. Goodyear, the celebrated inventor of all sorts of "Yankee notions" connected with India rubber, is getting up a new notion, to get rid of the nuisance of dust in railroad cars. The plan is to force the dust out of the windows while the cars are in motion. The annoyance now is, that it forces its way in at every chink, crevice, and opening. A counter current is obtained by the new plan, which, it is said, will effectually prevent the evil complained of.

A correspondent of the Newark Advertiser, present at the sale of the Jenny Lind tickets, says: The excitement was truly epidemic, and many of the coolest minds found themselves unexpectedly screaming, at the top of their lungs, $15. One, a member of the press, with a pass to the first concert in his pocket, was so borne away by the genius of the time and place, that he, too, was bidding for what he did not want.

The ship Elizabeth Amine has been destroyed by fire at Cumsingmoon, in India. She was laden with cotton, saltpetre and opium. A cask of spirits first caught fire, and almost immediately afterwards 1,300 bags of saltpetre went off like a shell, blowing the side of the vessel, cotton bales, opium chests, and other articles, high in the air.

Locks have been superseded on the Monklane canal, Canada West, by an inclined plane. The boats are floated into a box which moves on rollers, the whole drawn upon an inclined plane by a stationary engine. The new plan was tried last week, and three boats drawn up in less than five minutes.

The following superscription is copied from a letter now in the Post-Office in this city: "Mr. James franke H White hall st to be forwarded to paul ruttle and him to William shanahan and from him to Bridget Heaneagen New York."

We learn from the Rahway Advocate that a company of Philadelphia capatalists are about erecting an extensive establishment for the manufacture of brick, and have leased a large tract of ground below Rahway Port, for the purpose.

THE SUNDAY IN ENGLAND.

The following extract from the correspondence of The Independent, shows that in England the "friends of the Sabbath," (as the advocates of a stricter observance of the Sunday persist in calling themselves,) are beginning to see the folly of attempting to enforce by law what cannot be sustained by either Scripture or public opinion. The reaction, which is now acknowledged and lamented, was foreseen by some, and might have been foreseen by all, except for their judicial blindness or obstinate rejection of light. How many times over must this Sunday farce be acted, before people will learn the lesson it plainly teaches. God commands the sanctification of the Seventh Day, and connects with obedience to that command the most glorious promises. Men insist upon the desecration of the Seventh Day and the sanctification of the First Day, and every effort which they make to legalize this arrangement, serves only to involve them still deeper, and make their inconsistency still more apparent. In such circumstances, even "the children of the world" would see the necessity of changing their policy; why do not the professed "children of the light?" "In vain do they worship Me, teaching for doctrines the commandments of men." "Every plant which my Heavenly Father hath not planted shall be rooted up."

ENGLAND, Sept 8, 1850.

A few months since, we were rejoicing in the moral and intellectual power displayed in the advocacy of the Sabbath and its holy rest. The workshop and the factory, the mine and the cottage, and even the union-workhouse, contributed toward a body of patriotic and Christian literature, in the form of Prize Essays on the advantages of the Christian Sabbath. Desponding men, who were inclined "to despair of their country," owing to its abounding wickedness, became hopeful, and hopeful men rejoiced in the strong manifestation of sound and healthful religious principle in our midst. The attempt of Mr. Hill and the Post-office authorities, to disturb the repose which, from the first, had existed in the London office on Sundays, elicited a strong and influential opinion from the friends of Sabbath observances, who were encouraged to take the aggressive, and to demand not only that the Post-office rest of London on Sundays should not be broken, but that the unbroken labors of the Post-office officials in the country should have an end, and the Sabbath shine a day of rest for the thousands employed seven days in the week throughout the year, in collecting and delivering letters from house to house. Success appeared to attend these efforts. The executive, responding to an address of the House of Commons, granted even more than was asked for; but, it is believed, in treachery, and bad faith. The dispatch of mails, as well as the collection of letters, was stopped. Thousands of letter-carriers, who once, twice, and in some cases thrice a day, traversed our towns and cities, found themselves for the first time in possession of a day of rest.

This point gained, there has been a recession, and not only so, but, as if the powers of darkness were stirred to unusual effort, a new, powerful, and most threatening assault upon the sanctity of the Sabbath, and the traditional and national decent observance of it, has been made and is now making. Last Sabbath, by the authority of the Executive, the toil of the letter-carriers, both in town and mail, was resumed, and thousands of laborious and ill-paid public servants compelled to unbroken labor. On the same Lord's day, the system of Sunday excursion trains from London, reached a hight not before attained. From the huge population of what might be called the nation of London, many thousands of persons were precipitated upon towns at a distance of thirty, forty, sixty, eighty, and a hundred miles. The advertisements of the different companies, announcing cheap excursion trains, would fill half a column. The south-western railway disgorged upon Southampton, a quiet and orderly town, between two and three thousand persons—a larger number, probably, than had been assembled in all its churches and chapels, the worshipers in which were jostled by the crowds of Londoners thronging their streets. On the western line, Windsor, Oxford, Bath, were subjected to similar irruptions. The London and Brighton company announce excursion trains "every Sunday," at little more than nominal fares; but these, though not a third of the usual charges, have poured profits of from two to seven hundred pounds on the single day into the coffers of the directors of these companies—immense numbers have been induced to become excursionists.

Some of the evil effects of these Sunday trains are already palpable, though it is not possible fully to estimate them yet. Shutting the excursionists altogether out of the estimate, and looking merely at the influence of the practice upon the towns visited, the purport is serious and alarming. The national character will, to a great extent, be modified if not transformed. The excursion train is announced and expected; hundreds, nay, thousands go to the station to see it arrive and pour forth its unwonted freight of strangers. The pleasant flow of the stream of worshipers proceeding to places of worship, is broken in upon; the streams of population are mixed, turbid, and whirling. To the young, society presents a new form—the Sabbath a new aspect. A new and very different standard is erected. Thus, human affections and the purest and tenderest feelings of our nature are, as it were, suborned in favor of this system. The millions of London are made up of units from the country; that great Babylon would fall and perish, but for the new blood ever poured into its sluggish and morbid system. London is to the towns, to the stationary villages which cover England, what the far west is to New-England. There is no room at home, in the stagnant village, in the town, where every field of occupation is over-crowded; London is the general resort. Forty, sixty, eighty miles ordinarily are a great gulf between the "West End" of London and the native village or town of the clerk, shopman, artizan, laborer and domestic servant. These New Englanders are in Ohio, without the leisure of an American winter, without many dollars to spare, and almost without a pause in the struggle of life.

This being the state of things, the railway directors proclaim, "Hence, home from this far west of London, hence to Boston and back on the Sunday for three and sixpence," and not fourteen or fifteen shillings as on other days. A penny-post letter precedes the visitors, and "home" is in a flurry of expectation; the Sunday is theirs and for them; the fatted calf is killed, and church, and even chapel, is neglected by those who would not otherwise neglect them; then, too, from thickly-strewn villages, four or five of whose church towers and spires the traveler may see from almost any slight elevation, from these come in to the terminus the humble market carts, to meet and take "home" the excursionist son, daughter, brother, nephew, from London; and, truly, an affecting sight is it to see these, in scores or in hundreds, taking the fragrant spoils of the village garden, or even half a dozen ears of wheat, back to London on the evening of the day.

But it has happened that the day has been wet and gloomy. The Londoner, the mere Londoner, and his wife, or his daughter, are thrown upon a strange town; there are no "tea gardens," as in suburban London, nor even eating-houses; the beer-shop, the public-house, must be his resort; and these places have been and are thronged. Toward evening, husbands, wives, daughters, bewildered and stupified by the fumes of tobacco and beer, stagger to the station, and midnight or early morning finds them absorbed in the mighty and festering mass of London.

It may be said, "Surely, public opinion, religious opinion will correct this." Not so; public opinion is not decidedly against it; and by this we are made to feel, what would not otherwise be willingly recognized or admitted, the power and ascendancy of evil.

THE FUGITIVE SLAVE LAW.

The Independent of Oct. 3d contains a long article by Rev. H. W. Beecher, in which he endeavors to show that the Fugitive Slave Law recently passed by Congress can never be executed at the North. Mr. Beecher's "text" was furnished by the remark of a daily paper, that "Northern men cannot rejoice in the surrender of slaves, abstractly considered; but they ought to rejoice that the spirit of the Constitution is, at length, complied with, and that we no longer stand in the attitude of covenant-breakers." We copy a few stirring paragraphs of his commentary upon this text:—

It was once, we fear justly, the reproach of the free blacks of the North, that they were lazy, vicious, and worthless. That reproach is fast passing away. In no other equal number of our citizens, in the North, has a greater, perhaps we may say so great, an improvement taken place within the last fifteen years. They are generally anxious that their children should have common school education; their churches are more numerous and in better condition; they are learning trades, and beginning to accumulate property, and to become freeholders. Fugitive slaves, usually the smartest, the most enterprising, else they had not dared to achieve their liberty, are no exception. They fall into work; they seek honest menial employments; they are our best waiters, and honorably fill many humble offices of usefulness in society. The number of these Fugitives is greater than is generally supposed. There are in New York city probably between fifteen hundred and two thousand fugitive slaves usefully employed; in Boston, scarcely less. In places like Albany, Worcester, Utica, Buffalo, from two to five hundred. It is now upon the eve of winter. The single man can flee to Canada. Women and children cannot go without money, without place, occupation, or provision, except with the most disastrous suffering. We ask the most sober, the most prudent and conservative men, Do you believe that these thousands of men can be overtaken in our midst, dispersed they know not whither, or seized and carried back to the South, the expenses paid by the government, and so by us in part; and no excitement arise which will convulse society to its foundations? Can such a Law be executed. * * *

Besides these practical aspects, there are reasons intrinsic to the bill, that will make it a loathing, and will, when it comes to be fully known, make it, we believe, the most odious Act with which flagitious legislation ever abused public confidence.

One would have thought that an end so atrocious as this legal slave trade—as much worse than African, as it is worse to steal a man conscious of worth and eager for liberty than it would be to steal a wild savage, ignorant of rights and dignities—should have been sought in the most gentle and unobtrusive ways. But no. It breaks in upon the community like a hyena. It prostrates the great barriers which civilization has erected about individual rights—the habeas corpus act, the right of trial by jury, and often practically the right to confront one's accusers. That nothing might be wanting to render an infamous thing consistently infamous throughout, the bill provides a bribe of five dollars to the commissioner for every man tried, and ten for every man convicted! Five dollars for acquittal and twice as much for conviction!

Here is a government agent, with the powers of a civil court, whose salary depends upon the number of cases he can bring before him, and doubles whenever he convicts the arraigned! Who would go before a court of his country, if he knew that the judge had a pecuniary interest in his conviction? And yet the rights and liberties of thousands and thousands of men are, under this bill, to be adjudicated, without trial by jury, without appeal, upon testimony unregulated, save by the judgment of the commissioner, who is made personally and pecuniarily interested in every conviction!

There is one deep lower yet. If a wretch, endeavoring to escape the fangs of this venomous reptile, this coil of serpents, be aided by a humane man, heavy fines and bonds await such beneficence!

Yet there are some reasons why we too rejoice in the execution of this Law.

We are glad, because every slave taken from our midst back to slavery is an appeal to humanity against oppression. It is bringing the abomination of slavery to our very door. We are not obliged now to stretch our eyes across the ocean to Africa to see men snatched up as they fly from burning villages or captured in war, and shipped for Christian markets. Slave-catching may now be pursued in New York, in Boston, in Pittsburgh, in Cincinnati. It requires but two lying witnesses to doom any black man. It required only three hours to convert a respectable, honest, industrious free laborer in our streets into a slave under the plantation lash. When these things are done in the South they get cool before they reach us; but now we are to have slave-hunting, slave-catching, and slave making on our own premises. Is it by such means that the public mind is to be quieted? Is this the way to avoid and allay excitement, of which certain presses have had such dread? Will there be no violence, no bloodshed, among those poor fugitives whose love of liberty is as strong as ours, and who, like us, would sooner die than go into slavery? Are the arguments to which we are to yield our anti-slavery doctrines, irons on honest men's wrists; families broken up—a Hamlet at one blow struck out of the catalogue of men, his wife and children left without even the privilege of saying farewell? Are these to be means of grace to all who have agitated the public in the matter of slavery?

We 'rejoice' that men who have tasted of liberty, who have been made intelligent by it, if sent back to slavery, will not go as they came. They return missionaries, teachers of liberty and escape wherever they go. Put them in prison, put them in coffles, and send them in gangs southward; prisons, [illegible], and the biting lash, will never obliterate what they have learned. It is a wonderful Providence that the South should send their shrewdest slaves to the North, until they have become thoroughly trained to liberty, and then send for them to come back, and spread the infection from plantation to plantation!

We solemnly appeal to Christians of every name, to all sober and humane men unwrenched by party feelings, to all that love man, to behold and ponder this iniquity which is done among us! Shall an army of wretched victims, without a crime, unconvicted of wrong, pursuing honest occupations, be sent back to a loathed and detestible slavery? Here is no 'abstract' question. We ask you, shall men now free—shall members of the church—shall children from the school—shall even ministers of the Gospel—be seized, ironed, and in two hours be on the road to a servitude to them worse than death?

For our own selves, we do not hesitate to say, what every man who has a spark of manhood in him will say with us, that no force should bring us into such horrible bondage. Before we would yield ourselves, or go away to linger and long for death through burning years of injustice, we would die a thousand deaths. Every house should be our fortress, and when fortress and refuge failed us, then our pursuers should release our souls to the hands of God who gave them, before they should degrade them by a living slavery! Who shall deny these feelings and such refuge to a black man?

With such solemn convictions, no Law, impious, infidel to God and humanity, shall have respect or observance at our hands. We desire no collision with it. We shall not rashly dash upon it. We shall not attempt a rescue, nor interrupt the officers if they do not interrupt us. We prefer to labor peaceably for its early repeal, meanwhile saving from its merciless jaws as many victims as we can. But in those provisions which respect aid to fugitives, may God do so to us, yea and more also, if we do not spurn it as we would any other mandate of Satan. If in God's Providence fugitites ask bread or shelter, raiment or conveyance, at my hands, my own children shall lack bread before they; my own flesh shall sting with cold ere they shall lack raiment. I will both shelter them, conceal them, or speed their flight; and while under my shelter, or under my convoy, they shall be to me as my own flesh and blood; and whatsoever defense I would put forth for my own children, that shall these poor despised and persecuted creatures have in my house or upon the road. The man who shall betray a fellow-creature to bondage, who shall obey this law to the peril of his soul, and to the loss of his manhood, were he brother, son, or father, shall never pollute my hand with his grasp of hideous friendship, or cast his swarthy shadow across my threshold! For such service to those whose helplessness and poverty make them peculiarly God's children, I shall cheerfully take the pains and penalties of this Bill. Bonds and fines shall be honors; imprisonment and suffering will be passports to fame not long to linger! It is a joy and glory to believe that in these sentiments, substantially, the citizens of the North solemnly acquiesce.

THE BLIND GIRL TO HER SISTER.

BY MISS FANNY MALONE RAYMOND.

I heard your footsteps light, dear Nell,
Come bounding up the lane;
How glad I am no words can tell,
To feel you're here again.

As you passed singing o'er the brook
The lark's loud trill rose high;
The thrush called from the hazel nook—
Each thought his mate was nigh.

You've brought in sunshine with you, dear,
An odor from the hills;
Your gentle voice, so soft and clear,
The room with music fills.

All tongues, Nell, of your brightness speak,
And praise your beauty's glow—
Likening your lovely lips and cheek
To roses in the snow.

They tell me you have soft blue eyes,
Dark brows and sunny hair;
Mere outward loveliness they prize—
I know your soul's more fair.

Who leads me forth at break of day
To taste the morning air?
Who, when the sun's warmth dies away,
Soothes all my darkling care?

Nelly, my morn and evening star,
I scarcely wish for sight;
Your kind and gentle teachings are
The music of my night.

TRANSLATING THE BIBLE.

At the First Annual Meeting of the American Bible Union, recently held in New York, a very interesting address was delivered by Prof. Geo. W. Eaton, of Madison University, upon the resolution, "That the word of God should be translated into every language among men, in just such terms as shall most unmistakably convey the mind of the Spirit, as expressed in the original Hebrew and Greek." The N. Y. Tribune furnishes the following report of Mr. Eaton's remarks:—

After alluding to the importance of the resolution, and the vital principle it contained, which at first caused him to join the Union, he said that it should not require discussion or advocacy or enforcement in a Protestant assembly. All should recognize the will of God as found in the Scriptures of the Old and New Testaments. God, in his infinite mercy, has made to his benighted creatures a revelation of his mind respecting them; and this revelation is addressed to every individual man in particular. It contains a message specifically directed to every responsible individual of the human race; and it is of infinite importance to every soul that this message should reach him, and be considered by him, and received as the supreme law of God, to which he is to yield implicit obedience. This will call for the coöperation of the servants of God in every part of the world. They are commanded to send it forth and proclaim it to all parts of the world. It must not only be proclaimed by the voice of the Missionary to the Pagan, but the written word is to be submitted to the eye. Both these means of disseminating the word of God must be adopted by us in making known the will of God.

It is difficult to decide which is the more important, and we will not stop here for the purpose of determing that point. God has been pleased to order his revealed will to be recorded in written language. He selected holy men who were especially directed by his divine Spirit to register his revelations. These holy men became announcers of the divine words of the Scriptures, as given by inspiration from God. It was not long after God's will had been thus recorded that the languages in which it had been written ceased to be spoken among men, and became dead languages; and hence ceased to be susceptible of changes, so that God's truths are enshrined in unchangeable modes of expression—they are fixed lights in an immovable firmament. In consequence of these languages having ceased to exist and becoming dead languages, but very few among the sons of men could have access to the eternal fountain of life and salvation. You see, there, the necessity of multiplying translations of the original Scriptures. It would be impossible to teach these languages to the heathens of the earth, and thus put them in possession of the knowledge of God's revealed will. We must translate them into every language, as directed by the resolution. The work of translation, therefore, is a work of transcendant importance. But we must observe this difference between the translation and the inspired original—one is the impress of God's unerring Spirit, as recorded by the Apostles and holy men of the Old Testament, while the other is a human production, and must necessarily bear more or less the marks of human imperfection.

It is characteristic of human effort to arrive at perfection by degrees, by repeated trials. There may be a high degree of perfection attained by persevering efforts, and it may be so with regard to the translation of the Scriptures. There is no work to which human effort should be devoted with such perseverance. After continuing at considerable length in this strain, he exhorted the Society to persevere in its endeavors to circulate the Scriptures in every language. The province of this Society should not be misunderstood. It is thoroughly committed in this matter, and must perform the work in which it is engaged in the highest possible perfection. If the work be badly done, it will be repudiated, but if thoroughly and accurately accomplished you will receive the praise of man, and the praise of God is certainly awaiting you. God, you may depend upon it, will bless an association that takes for its motto the principle contained in the resolution. The God of the Bible will honor and sustain that principle, and the association that is faithful in the maintenance of it with regard to his revealed laws. We need not fear; our work is one of such responsibility that no expense should be spared in bringing to it the most eminent ability, and most indisputable proofs of sacred learning. The Society cannot do the work itself. It must secure men and means, by which it may be accomplished. The arguments that have been thrown out tending to discourage us from engaging in the work, have, I must say, met with no favor from me. Some have undertaken to prove that there was no necessity for this revision, because, forsooth, we are doing well enough under the version as it is. Had you proposed to make a version with especial reference to its adaptation to sectional peculiarities, you would not have my support. Let there, therefore, be a faithful version, which shall in all respects, as far as possible, reflect the meaning of the original, whatever may be the consequences to the Baptist denomination. I say, let the Spirit of God be placed before man, though it prove every man to be in a lie. I am a Baptist, the son of a Baptist, the grandson of a Baptist, and all my ancestors as far back as I can trace were Baptists, and still I am prepared to say, that if a faithful translation were to be the cause of dispersing the Baptist denomination to all quarters of the earth, let it be made.

MISSIONARY INTELLIGENCE.

On the afternoon of Second-day, Oct. 7, an interesting meeting was held at the Missionary Rooms in New York, the exercises at which are described as follows in one of the daily papers:—

A letter was read, dated Bombay, June 25. A number of schools have been established there within a comparatively recent period, and are attended in large numbers. Wealthy individuals, particularly in the larger cities, are availing themselves of these schools to educate their daughters.

Mr. Marsh writes from Mosul, under date of June 24. The prospects of the mission are flattering. The numbers attending religious worship steadily increase.

Mr. Schneider, writing from Aintab, July 23, gives highly favorable reports respecting the results of missionary effort among the Armenians. Two years ago there were not more than 30 or 40 decided Protestants in Aintab. Now their number is estimated at 400. Beside these, about 25 males are desirous of being enrolled upon the list.

A letter was read from Mr. Van Lennep, at Constantinople. He recommends the organization of a church among the Greeks of Constantinople. He states that the native portion of the Protestant Armenian Church recently held a Conference at Constantinople for the purpose of reporting the state of the churches.

Rev. Dr. Adams read an extract of a letter recently received from the missionary at Madura, indicating the progress which the work of Christian evangelization has been making in the East. It was of an encour- [illegible] prevalent that Christianity is destined to uproot and overturn Hindooism. The Doctor also mentioned that he had received a letter describing the great degree of religious interest at this time pervading the Chinese in San Francisco. There is a universal desire to obtain the Bible and religious books.

Mr. Bliss, of Trebizond, announced his arrival at his station, in a letter dated August 17. He was amazed at the change which had taken place during his absence. There had been much oppostion, but the spirit of God's truth was pervading the masses more and more. Contempt and hatred were fast giving place to esteem and approbation, and the missionaries were cordially welcomed to the society of those by whom they were formerly discarded.

A PASTORAL MINISTRY.

"I will give you pastors."—Jer. iii. 15.

The minister for the times is a Pastor. In other words, he "takes heed to the flock over which the Holy Ghost has made him an overseer." The preaching of the gospel is, indeed, the great means of converting and saving men; while yet the Scriptures plainly and strongly connect with this work—subsidiary to it—and, as it were, indispensable to its appropriate result—what is termed, in distinction from preaching, pastoral efforts and labors. Preaching saves men; but it must be genuine preaching—enlightened, suitable, well-adapted preaching,—if this great object shall be fully accomplished; and such preaching ordinarily exists only in unison with pastoral watchfulness and wisdom. Hence it is that the pastoral ministry is an essential department of the sacred office; and hence, too, when there is deficiency in this department, the labors of the pulpit, though otherwise able and acceptable, are of comparatively little effect. Happy for the church and the world, were this great truth engraven upon the heart of every gospel minister upon earth! The idea is still far too prevalent, that a minister's great duty, for the most part, goes out in public preaching. An error this, as insidious and plausible, as it is unscriptural and fatal; and is the more prevalent, as it tallies so well with the worldliness and sloth which, we must fear, tinge too much the character of some who wait at the altar.

Preaching! What is preaching to a congregation? Is it the mere repetition of the general principles of Christianity—such as we quote from books, and gather in the cloister? Is it the mere doling out of theology and ethics? Is it the dissertation of a student—the babbling of a recluse? God forbid! This amounts not to preaching; and he who has exercised himself thus, and wondered at his barrenness, must, henceforth, wonder no more. He fails to preach—fails well-nigh as disastrously as he who mounts the pulpit without thought or arrangement, and pours out a mere broken and ghastly mass of declamation and vociferation. Thou wilt not preach to that congregation without preparation; and an essential part of a perfect preparation must be thy deep and familiar acquaintance with the religious circumstances of the people before thee.

The pastoral department supplies some of the essential elements of the effective and successful sermon. It imparts to the public preaching an indispensable knowledge—breathes into it an indispensable spirit and warmth—inspires it with an indispensable style—and points out the indispensable application. Mark if such be not the Scripture view of this most important subject. The good minister, for example, is to give to each a portion in due season. But how can he do this, except either by miracle, or by ascertaining, through pastoral diligence, what the exact "portion" is? Again, what is this "watching for souls as they that must give account?" Is such momentous watching fulfilled in a mere sermon begotten and reared up in solitude, and with no more adaptation to those particular "souls" than to any others whom the minister is not appointed to watch, and for whose salvation he is not so specially accountable? Yet again; what is this "taking heed to the flock," which the apostle, in imagery so significant as well as beautiful, enjoins upon the ministers of Ephesus? Is all this poetry, a mere "song," or means he not, rather, that those elders were to exercise a constant, minute, and impartial care over their respective charges, correspondent to that of "a good shepherd?" Once more; what of the example of the apostle, who himself appears, for a time, to have acted the pastor at Ephesus? He teaches publicly, of course, "and from house to house;" and for three years ceases not to warn every one, night and day, with tears. How was this? Was all this effort in the shape of pulpit sermons? or was it not by public discourses and by personal addresses combined—the two modes reciprocally and mightily aiding each the other? Went not these two apostolic influences hand in hand, just as previously, when daily, in the temple and in every house, Peter and John ceased not to teach and preach Jesus Christ? This is a plain matter. What God hath joined together, let not man put asunder. We may not mend the ways and works of God, nor be wise above what he has written. The apostolic minister of old was a pastor. The minister for these times is equally a pastor. No other is suitable. No other will, in general, be of great use. The age requires not mere hirelings—not those who, while they preach on Sabbaths, are yet remiss and neglectful at other seasons. The times demand of a minister that he "care for souls"—that he be instant at all seasons—that he spare no pains, whether in the pulpit or out of it—warning every man, and teaching every man, that he may present every one perfect in Christ Jesus. PREACHING IN THE OPEN AIR.

The Christians of London are commencing systematic operations for bringing the masses of people, who throng the streets and [illegible] tion, by means of street preachers. Preachers go forth into the midst of the throngs of people and engage in conversation, and it may be in discussion with infidels, and soon a congregation gathers around them, and before they are aware, these idlers in the streets are interested listeners to the unfolding of the unsearchable riches of Christ. For some weeks past this work has been done regularly every Sunday, by several laborers, and with very encouraging success. The Christian Instruction Society have taken up the work and made their appeal to the public for funds to extend it. We see not why something like this might not be done in our large cities. The thousands that throng our cities, exposed to the worst influences, and wholly separated from the means of grace, ought in some way to be reached. The gospel should be carried to those who will not come to hear it. We must learn the difficult lesson of going out into the highways and hedges and compelling them to come in. One of the street preachers in London says that the constant outcry of the people in the streets is, "The white choakers will not come to us." And yet he says, that these people show a great readiness to listen to the gospel when it is brought to them. There, infidel declaimers have somewhat prepared the way for gospel preachers. By haranguing the people in the streets of London, they have formed themselves to a habit of listening to open air speeches and debates, and so have opened a door for proclaiming the gospel. And now Divine Wisdom "standeth in the top of high places, by the way, in the places of the paths; she crieth at the gates, at the coming in at the doors, Unto you, O men, I call, and my voice is to the sons of men."

This is the way in which the missionaries in India get their hearers. And may not the modes of action which necessity has taught the Christian laborers among the heathen, be successfully applied to those who have hitherto preferred the habits of heathens in Christian lands? It is doubtless true, that it requires a peculiar tact in a speaker to arrest attention and gather hearers in the streets. And yet the faculty of preaching after this form, is as capable of cultivation as that of preaching in the pulpit. If something like this could be brought into broad and successful operation, it would supply an important chasm in our present instrumentalities, and enable us to approach a numerous class of people hitherto beyond our reach.

SUPERANNUATED MINISTERS.—We know one, says the St. Louis Presbyterian, upwards of seventy-five years of age, and very feeble from premature infirmities, occasioned by excessive toils of previous years, and a physical constitution always feeble and sickly, who has been compelled for several years past to subsist upon alms, and has no other means of support. He has also an aged wife, and several little grandchildren, who are obliged to share his poverty with him. We have known this aged Presbyterian minister, feeble as he is, actually to go about the streets of the town where he lives, soliciting charity—begging from people of the world a little bacon or meat, or flour or wood, or other necessaries, just to keep himself and family from starvation.

The Sabbath Recorder.

New York, October 17, 1850.

WHEN WAS THE SABBATH CHANGED?

A distinguished Baptist minister in Philadelphia writes us the following:—

"I would be much gratified to have you examine, if you have not done so, the evidences that the Sabbath was changed from the first to the seventh day, on the exodus of Israel from Eygpt, and changed back again by Christ.

2. The seventh day of God, to Adam was the first day of his existence.

3. The day being changed helped to keep Jews apart from the heathen.

4. When a universal Church was established by Christ, it was better to have our Sabbath the same as the heathen.

5. It is a fact, (which I found when traveling in India,) that the heathen keep the seventh day Sabbath on our first day of the week.

I myself have long been satisfied that this is the true state of the case."

Our reading upon the Sabbath question has been pretty extensive; but as for evidences that the Sabbath was changed on the exodus of Israel from Egypt, we confess that we have not seen them. Whatever has fallen under our notice, has amounted to nothing more than that "it was the opinion of many learned men that the Sabbath underwent a change at that time." But that not being a very reliable kind of evidence with us, we have always dismissed it with simply calling for the proof. The change that was contended for, however, was not from the first to the seventh day, as stated by our correspondent, but from the seventh day to the sixth. According to this notion, those who now keep the first day of the week are actually returned to the ancient patriarchal Sabbath. We suppose that this is what our correspondent means, and that when he says, "the Sabbath was changed from the first to the seventh day on the exodus of Israel," he uses the term "first" in the sense in which it appears to be explained in his second paragraph, namely, as denoting the first day of Adam's existence. He means, as we take it, that the Sabbath, which originally stood upon the first day of Adam's existence, was changed to the seventh day of his existence; which, counted in regular order, would bring us down to the sixth day of the second week of time. Are we right in our supposition?

According to this view, the sixth day of the creation week became the sanctified day of the fourth commandment. But are we so egregiously mistaken as to the import of that commandment? According to our understanding, it enjoins the observance of that particular day of the week upon which God is supposed to have put his blessing. It sets forth the fact, that there was some particular day, in distinction from every other, upon [illegible] inspired record tells us (Gen. 2 : 3,) that that day was the seventh or last day of the first week of time. Both the record, and the commandment, also set forth the reason why God "blessed" and "sanctified" that day rather than any other of the seven. It was because it was the day of His own rest. "He rested on the seventh day from all his work which he had made. And God blessed the seventh day and sanctified it; because that in it he had rested from all his work which God created and made." There is no mistake here. The last day of the week was the day of Jehovah's rest; it therefore became a sanctified or holy day. Does this reason apply to the sixth day of the week—the seventh of Adam's existence?

Now, we want no better proof, that the Sabbath enjoined by the fourth commandment upon the Israelites was the true Paradisiacal Sabbath—the seventh day of the week—than the fact, that the particular thing which was enjoined upon them, was to remember and keep holy a day which had long previously been constituted holy. Not one which was made holy from that time, but one which God had before made holy by sanctifying it. And that there might be no mistake as to when, or how long ago, God put his blessing upon it, the commandment is very particular in referring to the act of God in blessing and sanctifying it at the close of creation. We say, we want no better proof. For if the fourth commandment enjoined the observance of a day already and long previously sanctified, and that day the day of God's own rest, it could not, and did not, enjoin the observance of the sixth day of the week, although that was the seventh of Adam's existence. Besides, if on the exodus of Israel the Sabbath was changed to the sixth day of the week, it must have been the intention of Jehovah, in the fourth commandment, to enjoin the observance of—the sixth day of the week; in which case, it is passing strange, that he should have used language which calls attention to the seventh day, with all the definiteness which it is in the power of terms to do; not only not announcing the holiness of the sixth day at all, but absolutely covering up all allusion to it by drawing attention to the holiness of another day!

That God constituted holy the seventh or last day of the creation week, is to our mind as clear as demonstration. Nothing in the whole range of historical facts is more certain. He did it, when he rested upon it. And if, at the expiration of twenty-five hundred years from that time, he commanded the Israelites to remember it, and keep it holy, it is a convincing proof that he intended them to do so. Yes, he intended them to keep holy that day, rather than the sixth, the fifth, the first, or any other. So the Israelites always understood it; so it was understood by their prophets and teachers; so, finally, it was understood by the Saviour himself.

Our brother does not say, that he views the Sabbath law as enjoining simply the observance of the seventh part of time, or the seventh day after any six of labor; yet his arguments agree with no other view. The doctrine of a change is not consistent with any other. But, aside from the fact that God's ancient people never understood this to be the meaning of the law, but always understood it to enjoin explicitly the last day of the week, the considerations which we have presented show, most conclusively, that this is a mistaken view. God's blessing was put—not upon the seventh part of time; not upon any day indefinitely which might, by the appointment of men, be the seventh after six of labor; but—upon the last day of the creation week, and upon no other. Thus the blessing was fixed and determined to a particular day.

We think that the impression very generally prevails—perhaps our worthy correspondent may not be free from it—that the import of the Sabbath law is something like this: That God sanctifies to every man his own act of resting on the day appropriated for the purpose, rendering the act a blessing to his soul, and that this is what is meant by the expression, "The Lord blessed the Sabbath day and hallowed it"—that though this is expressed in the past tense, and refers to something done as long ago as the creation, it merely means that God did, so long ago, determine that man's act of resting from labor every seventh day, and spending the time religiously, should be attended with a blessing to him—that the expression, "The seventh day is the Sabbath of the Lord thy God," means nothing more than that God claims from us one day in seven, to be spent as a Sabbath or season of rest and devotion. This, if we mistake not, is supposed to be the full meaning of the fourth commandment.

Those who, by a kind of sliding rule, make the law apply to any day which may, by conventional appointment or otherwise, be selected as a Sabbath, will readily endorse the foregoing. But we do not hesitate to say, that it is a construction wholly unauthorized. That the Most High makes a man's act of sabbatizing—provided he does it in spirit and in truth—a blessing to his soul, we most firmly believe; and we are willing to admit, that so much is implied in the expression, "The Lord blessed the Sabbath day and hallowed it." But that the divine blessing is there spoken of in reference to man's own act, rather than in reference to the day, we cannot admit. The language is express and unequivocal: "The Lord blessed the Sabbath DAY." And but for the blessing upon [illegible] institution of the Sabbath could have no existence. And till the institution is made to have an existence, man cannot be blessed in the observance of it. For that act, by which he secures to himself the blessing, is the keeping of the Sabbath day holy. But unless God has first made the day holy, how can man esteem it to be so?—the thing commanded being, that man should keep holy that which God has already made so.

Then as to the expression, "The seventh day is the Sabbath of the Lord thy God:" to suppose that it means, merely, that God claims from us one day in seven to be spent as a Sabbath, thus implying that it is something which we in our wickedness are disposed to withhold from him, but which we ought, according to the law, to give to him as his due, is, to say the least, a very superficial view. The plain and obvious meaning of it is, that "the seventh day, or last day of the week, is the Sabbath [Rest] which the Lord thy God observed." And the commandment enjoins man to observe it, in its weekly return, by way of commemorating that Rest. The necessity of confining our observance to the last day of the week is hence apparent. For there would be no more appropriateness in commemorating Jehovah's rest on some other day, than in commemorating our national independence on some other day besides the fourth of July.

If we are correct in our views, the fourth commandment, thrown into the form of a paraphrase, would read something like this: "Remember the day of the Rest spoken of in Gen. 2 : 2, 3; and keep it holy. Six days shalt thou labor and do all thy work, but the seventh or last day of the week (Heb. day the seventh) is the Rest which Jehovah thy God observed after he had finished his work. In it thou shalt not do any work, thou, nor thy son, nor thy daughter, nor thy man-servant, nor thy maid-servant, nor thy stranger that is within thy gates. For in six days the Lord made heaven and earth, the sea, and all that in them is, and rested, or kept Sabbath, on the seventh day (Heb. day the seventh.) Wherefore the Lord blessed the Rest-day (day of the rest) and hallowed it." Whether it is possible for language to designate the day commonly called Saturday with greater definiteness, let the reader judge.

Having shown that the Sabbath observed by the Israelites, after their exodus from Egypt, was the true Paradisiacal Sabbath, from the fact that this, and this only, was what God enjoined upon them, we might here rest the argument. For it cannot be supposed, without reflecting upon the character of Jehovah, that he would command his people to observe the day of his own rest, if his intention was to have them observe the seventh of Adam's existence instead. When he speaks, he means what he says; he does not command one thing and mean another. "All his commandments are sure, and are done in truth and uprightness." Ps. 11 : 8. The same consideration proves, that the true time had never been lost; or that, if it had, it was restored by the falling of the manna. For God could not, consistently with his perfections, command his people to keep the day of his own rest, if loss of the true time rendered obedience impossible.

Upon the third and fourth paragraphs (as we have numbered them) of our brother's communication, we have only to remark, that if the object of the heathen, upon their Sabbath, was to do homage to the Creator of "heaven and earth, the sea, and all that in them is," there was no necessity to keep the Jews apart from them. The reason of hedging in the Jews by themselves was, that they might not be contaminated with the abominations of the heathen. But if the object of the heathen was, as every body knows, to worship the Sun, their chief deity, the reason for the separation of God's people from them was as cogent after "a universal church was established" as it was before. Though the new dispensation threw open the door of the kingdom to the Gentiles, it offered no fellowship to any of their abominations. Christ is no more ready to meet the heathen on middle ground, and compromise with them, than Moses was. As for the Sabbath, it was expressly declared to be a token or "sign," that the God who "sanctified" or set apart the Israelites for his worship, was Jehovah, the self-existent God, the Creator of the ends of the earth, in opposition to any and all of the gods worshiped by the heathen. (See Exod. 31 : 13.) It is a "sign" of precisely the same thing to Christians. To the Israelites it was a "sign," that their God was not a dumb idol, "the work of men's hands," but the Maker of all things. It was a standing monument to remind them of the great fact, that their God was the One who, "in six days, made heaven and earth, the sea, and all that in them is." It serves the same purpose to all others who become separated to the worship of this God. But to the heathen, what was their Sabbath? A "sign" that the god, to whose service and abominations they were consecrated, was Baal—Phœbus—the Sun. Is it likely that Jehovah would give up the day which serves to attest his creative operations, and his wisdom, power, and goodness, as displayed thereby, for the sake of meeting those heathenish predilections which could claim no other origin but the defilements of idolatry? It may to some seem "better to have our Sabbath the same as the heathen," but has God pronounced it better?

As to the "fact" stated in the fifth paragraph, we presume it is correct. All we have to say about it is, that if the heathen call Sunday the seventh day of the week, making Monday the first day, it is what they [illegible] ditional proof, that they are without that light which Divine Revelation gives.

It will be observed, that we have not gone into an examination of what our brother calls "the evidences that the Sabbath was changed on the exodus of Israel;" and we may not, therefore, have met his wishes. But we have presented the law of the Sabbath in such a light as to show, that the doctrine of a change is utterly inadmissible, and all calculations pretending to show any such change must necessarily be false, inasmuch as they come into direct conflict with the word of truth and the known attributes of God. Having proved that the Paradisiacal Sabbath was given to the Israelites, we have disproved every contrary argument. We are not willing to have it inferred, however, that we are ignorant of the ground taken by those who assert a change of the Sabbath prior to the promulgation of the law. We have looked at their arguments, and are perfectly well convinced that they are made up of confident assertions and groundless assumptions. The works of Joseph Mede, Jennings' Jewish Antiquities, and Bedford's Scripture Chronology, contain the strength of all that has been written on this side of the question. Their position was very ably examined by J. A. Begg, in an article which appeared in the Sabbath Recorder of Dec. 9, 16, 23, and 30, 1847. To these papers we refer our readers. We would be glad to furnish them to our correspondent. Perhaps we may, some day, republish them in a condensed form.

EDUCATIONAL EFFORTS OF THE BAPTISTS.—The Baptist Denomination have attempted, and seem likely to accomplish, great things for the cause of education. Within a year past, over $100,000 has been raised to endow Brown University; a proposition has been made, and is in a fair way of being carried out, to raise $60,000 for Madison University; and the new University at Rochester is tugging hard to raise $200,000 as an endowment. The subscriptions for the latter institution have already reached $130,000. It is proposed to raise $50,000 in this city and vicinity alone for the object. One church in Brooklyn has given nearly $8,000.

MISSIONARY EFFORTS IN NEW YORK.—The mission recently established in the vicinity of "the Points," New York, appears to be in a flourishing condition. Religious meetings are regularly held and well attended; over five hundred persons have taken the temperance pledge; a temperance grocery has been opened, and also places for giving out work to the poor, and especially to those who manifest a desire to reform. The attempt to benefit the vagabond boys and girls who abound in the city, by getting up meetings with special reference to them, has also proved quite successful. The attendance at these meetings has been larger than was anticipated, and many have been induced to attend day or evening schools.

GLIMPSES OF DOMESTIC LIFE IN CHINA—NO. 6.

The New Year—Mourning—&c.

SHANGHAI, Feb. 12, 1850.

To-day is the Chinese New Year. We have been looking forward to it as to a season of general festivity, when every face should gather smiles, and every heart beat freely. For this is the nation's Jubilee. All accounts are supposed to have been settled, all debts paid, and every man's reputation redeemed, so that neighbor may meet neighbor, and friend greet friend, with that bold cheerfulness which nothing but a feeling of perfect independence can inspire. Nor have the family claims been overlooked. The usual domestic preparations have all been made, the dwellings swept and garnished, the household gods (including the pictures of ancestors) made particularly conspicuous, their shrines decorated with vases of fruits, flowers, &c., among which the citron, called the hand of Budh (Veh-suh,) and the flowers of the narcissus, are the most conspicuous, in addition to the never-omitted incense rods, and their more showy accompaniments of red or green tapers, ready for lighting when occasion demands.

Cards were already written out, presents prepared, and the eve of the joyful time already welcomed, when lo! sudden as the trump of the arch-angel, is heard the funeral knell of all anticipated festivities. Let laughter be turned into mourning, and mirth into heaviness, for death has entered the Celestial Empire, has gone up to the royal palace, and the mother of the king is laid low. Now is there silence and dull vacuity in the streets that should have been full of merry sounds and all the picturesque beauty of this most picturesque time. For twenty successive days—(such is the Emperor's will)—the funeral pall must overspread the land. Nineteen were already past, before the echo from the knell of death could reach our distant ears; but its notes are sad and deep, and this twentieth and last has concentrated all the gloom of the past nineteen. To-morrow the common people are free. Not so the mandarins, and other officers of government. Their term of mourning lasts one hundred days. Eighty are yet to come, in which they must wear no fancy colors, engage in no amusements, must remove the ball and crimson silk from their caps, and remain for the whole time unshaven. To-morrow, then, the common people may keep the festival. But to-day all is silent as the house of death. Yesterday, how different, with all its busy preparations for this welcome morn! Even to watching "the old [illegible] usual. The midnight salutations were as long and loud as ever. The whizzing of sky-rockets, the explosion of crackers, the firing of guns, and the "smell of war," did not cease until the new year was fairly installed in the place of the old. But these are the only demonstrations of joy. The eye misses sadly those livelier exhibitions of men in gay clothing, passing to and fro; the rich in their elegant sedans, accompanied by servants in their best attire, carrying for them their pack of crimson cards, which, in default of footmen, occupy a conspicuous place at the back of the chair; or the more humble pedestrian, carrying his own red pack, one of which is left at every house he enters, or at every door where his friends reside, if he have not time or inclination to call. The "koong-she, koong-she, pa-nea," if heard at all, falls faintly on the ear, and the gesture of obeisance, the motion of half kneeling, and the affected effort to prevent it, have less of emphasis in them, if not less of cordiality, as if one general hue of sadness mantled the whole gloomy city. The depth of actual sorrow accompanying all this show, it is needless attempting to sound. The Royal Mother, who, by the way, is only step-mother to the Emperor, must be a very aged woman, Tauk-wang himself having been on the eve of dying with old age these many years. (He enters to-day upon the thirtieth year of his reign.) But the aged and the dead are the objects of reverence with the Chinese; and although in this, as too often in other cases, they are evidently only acting a part, still they have become so accustomed to it that it seems a second nature to them.

It must fall heavily upon the young and joyous children, this privation of their accustomed sports, at least if they miss them comparatively as much as ourselves; and nothing else do we miss so much as the presence and the music of the ever graceful kite, whose hey-day of popularity is coincident with the inaugural honors which usher in the glad new year. According to custom, they should be now hovering over the city, in all their varied forms and hues, from that of the flying angel, whose pinions, straight and square, appear as if clipped in their earthward flight, to the mammoth butterfly, whose delicate wings have wheels within, ever whirling to the motion of the breeze that buoys them up; the golden fish, the crimson scorpion, and ruddy crab, have also their wheels, but in the heart, which send forth a sound, varying from that of the Æolian harp to the loud humming of a top. More frequently, however, the chords are arranged somewhat after the manner of the harp, being drawn across the mouth, and appearing as if firmly grasped by the hands, tentaculæ or claws, as the case may be, of the ærial songster, who thus discourses most eloquent music in the most unmusical ears of the listeners below. These kites are made of a very strong sort of silken paper, stretched upon a light frame work of bamboo, admirably adapting them to the lofty flights for which they are designed. All these we miss most sadly. And now, to add to the general gloom, there comes an eclipse of the sun. The heavens, all day dark with clouds, grow darker beneath the moon-obstructed rays, and seem to anticipate the approaching twilight. Yet no drum beats, no gong is rung to frighten away the voracious fish who is endeavoring to swallow up the sun, and we wonder whether this too is a part of that strange order of the day which enforces such unbroken silence. The horrid din, hitherto considered indispensable in this work of rescue, is now entirely suspended. Not even a voice is lifted up on behalf of the suffering orb of day, as the darkness increases; and although the thick clouds shut out the magnificent spectacle from our view, no one can be left in doubt as to the time of its occurring. It passes away; the light returns; and perhaps the poor heathen have learned what they have hitherto professed to consider impossible, that the din of drums, and gongs, and voices, is not indispensable to the rescue of the sun from the jaws of his terrible pursuer.

The Chinese Civil Year is not regulated by its number of days, as with us, but is reckoned from the new moon which falls nearest the time when the sun is in the 15° of Aquarius, which is also considered as the beginning of the Natural Year, and is celebrated by the festival of "meeting the spring." Dates may also be regulated from it, as from New Year's Day. And much do they make of each. For instance, the child born yesterday is two years old to-day, having already had the honor of living under two different eras, the year of Tauk-wang twenty-nine, and the year of Tauk-wang thirty.

There is one most striking superstition, associated with the closing of one year and the opening of another, which must not be omitted, viz. a custom which the natives have of drawing a supply of water from their wells, on the last day of the year, sufficient for the three succeeding days, and also allowing no water to be poured upon the ground during the same interval, a supply of vessels having been previously prepared for receiving such as may have been used; the reason assigned being, the fear of disturbing the demon that presides over the fountains, whose anger once aroused might lead to the most disastrous results.

MARCH 20th.

A month has passed without an opportunity of sending to you having occurred. Meanwhile new edicts from the Emperor [illegible] with respect to their mourning. The laws which at first extended only to the mandadarins, have reached the common people. The barbers' shops are all closed, fancy colors are everywhere obsolete, in which respect, even the loyalty of the ladies is tested. Marrying and giving in marriage is prohibited to the common people one hundred days, to literary men and mandarins one year, and to the higher officers of Government for three years, (the regulations being the same as those observed in the mourning for parents.) No musical instruments must be sounded for the hundred days, nor theatrical exhibitions performed for the whole year. Most filially are all these orders received by the children of the "son of Heaven," and the spirit of obedience is hastening to its final development, when lo! another peal, louder and still longer, bursts out from the chamber of death, and the cry is heard, "Tauk-wang himself has followed the shade of his illustrious mother down to darkness and the worm." He who was called the "Ten Thousand Years," has vanished as a tale that is told, and his age is as nothing. The "Glory of Reason," as his self-selected title (Tauk-wang) literally signifies, is obscured by the shadows of the tomb, and the mourning which was commenced at his own command, to the memory of his mother, is merged in still deeper shades upon his own decease. A BIT OF A SABBATH DISCUSSION.

To the Editors of the Sabbath Recorder:—

A few days back, a missionary laboring under the American and Foreign Christian Union, called where I am employed, for the purpose of getting a poor convert from Popery into work, and was pleased to invite me to his house on the succeeding First-day evening. (Query—Should the time after sunset of First-day be so called?) Complying with the invitation kindly given, I had the pleasure of meeting a few fugitives from Rome, who, to use the expressive language of the venerable Deacon Stillman, "have not got quite out of Rome yet." I found that these, with others, are accustomed to assemble a couple of evenings in each week, at the residence of the missionary, for prayer and social conversation, intended to promote their mutual edification; and it was agreed to consider, at their meeting upon Fifth-day, the question, "Which of the seven days of the week is the Sabbath of the Lord our God—obligatory, not on Christians or on Jews exclusively, but upon all mankind, represented in Adam, ere yet man's first disobedience brought death into the world and all our woe?"

We accordingly met on Fifth-day evening, and the writer was called upon to open the business of the evening. This was done by a reference "to the law and to the testimony," commencing with the 2d chapter of Genesis, 2d and 3d verses, which were distinctly read from the Bible, calling on the meeting either to prove that Adam was a Jew, or, in candor and Christian justice, to discountenance the gratuitous and invidious application of the epithet Jewish to the seventh-day Sabbath. The reader next read the passage in Exodus, 16th chapter, narrating the descent of the manna in the wilderness, and the attending circumstances, defining the day of the Sabbath appointed by the Eternal, with so much precision as to preclude any doubt upon this important point. Next, was read the Moral Law relative to the day "written with the finger of God upon tables of stone;" then some of the glorious promises made to such as would faithfully observe it, remarking on the absence of promises connected with institutions merely ceremonial. Feeling that I had occupied perhaps quite enough of the time of the meeting, I deemed it prudent to conclude, and leave an opportunity to reply.

The missionary was in the chair, but undertook to reply; and, to make short work of the utter demolition of your humble correspondent, remarked at the outset, that I either disregarded the authority, or had forgotten the existence, of the Lord Jesus Christ, for I had not once named him in the course of my address. Passing by my authorities from the Old Testament without a word of reply, he commenced a recitation—(he did not condescend to read a single text)—of those passages in the New Testament stating the fact that the disciples from time to time met on the first day of the week, after the ressurrection of our Lord Jesus Christ, who frequently joined their assemblies—that these meetings were for worship and purposes showing that they regarded the first day as the Sabbath.

The missionary's time at length ran out, when an interesting young man stood up to address the meeting, who has been, I believe, a theological student at Montreal for the Roman Catholic priesthood. He stated that he had been brought up to the observance of the first day as the Sabbath—that he still celebrates the resurrection of Christ upon that day, and it is his intention to do so until death. Here a glow of satisfaction seemed for a moment to light up the countenance of our Chairman—but, alas! it was only transient. Our speaker went on to state, that while such is his practice, and such his intention, on reviewing, since the opening of our meeting, the passages throughout the Old and New Testaments relating to the Sabbath, he could not recall a single "Thus saith the Lord," declaring the first day to be a Sabbath, and that, therefore, he must regard the seventh day as the only Sabbath of the Bible.

This gentleman was followed by another, a Protestant by birth and descent, who, to the complete surprise of our assembly, most ably sustained the same position—our poor Chairman seeming to writhe as under torture during the addresses of this gentleman, who is a missionary, and the former speaker. He became so excited at last,* and so impatient to put an end to this unwelcome, because too cogent, address, that (like my countryman, who, on being requested by his master to awake him at six, awoke him at four to tell him he had full two hours to sleep yet,) he interrupted the speaker to tell him he had now only one minute of his time unexpired. When he set down, up rose our Chairman, and indignantly asked, "Is there any one to speak for Christ against these Jews?"

Not only the parties at whom such sarcasm was leveled, but the whole meeting, remonstrated in vain against the intemperance of our Chairman's conduct, and manifested the strongest disposition to afford a fair hearing to the respective speakers.

* At this stage of our proceedings, I was forcibly reminded of a poor half-witted young man in the old country, who was one day observed by his acquaintances to be very busy arranging himself in his best suit to attend a discussion in the adjoining town. This was to be conducted in Latin, with which the party referred to was known to be unacquainted. One of his friends asked, "What advantage can you gain by listening to the debate, when you do not know what they are saying? Sure, you cannot tell who is right or who is wrong." "Oh yes, I can," replied he; "whoever I see get vexed first, I am certain is wrong."

MR. BARNES' EXPOSITORY LABORS.—Barnes' Notes on the Gospels have been translated and published in the Welsh language. In a letter to Rev. Thomas Rees, of Wales, Mr. B. speaks of his expository labors as drawing to a close. The Notes on Daniel are finished, but will not be published for some time. He is half way through the work on the Revelations. He says:

"When these works are sent forth to the world, if they ever are, I shall feel that my work in this department of labor is ended; for I do not contemplate the preparation of any other work on the Scriptures. I should have been glad, if I could, to have prepared a work on the Psalms; but the work seems to me to be so great and difficult, that I do not now think of attempting it."

ELEGANT BIBLES.—Lippincott & Co., of Philadelphia, are now issuing Bibles in a style which does great credit to American skill in the departments of book-printing and book-binding. The paper is stout and heavy, the type is bold and beautiful, and the binding is of morocco, grooved and paneled and edged with chased gilding, altogether presenting a most attractive piece of workmanship. Mr. Lippincott has for years made it his ambition to rival the Oxford press in choice editions of the Bible, and he is fast approximating the standard which has so long been maintained under royal favor.

An order was issued in July, [illegible] the supreme government of India, discontinuing in the army the morning dram of arrack (a coarse description of brandy.) Drinking in barracks has been put an end to from the date of this order.

The Estate of Bro. Maxson Green.—As some interest has been excited in the public mind upon the subject of the disposition of Bro. Maxson Green's property, and as something was said a few weeks since with regard to it by a correspondent, perhaps it might be proper for me to make the following statements:—

1. Bro. Green did not leave a will.

2. He did leave a writing, executed some twelve years since, signifying his wishes in this matter.

3. This writing is not so executed as to be valid in law. But

4. It is firmly believed, that every wish expressed in said writing will be religiously adhered to by his heirs, (except, perhaps, in the case of minors or those otherwise incapacitated;) and it is farther believed, that every known and fully authenticated wish of Bro. Green will be adhered to on the part of those into whose hands the estate may fall.

Missionaries Coming Home.—Rev. J. S. Green, a missionary at the Sandwich Islands, in a letter to the American Missionary Association, expresses his regret at the continuance of the practice of missionaries removing from the islands with their families, or sending their children to the United States for education and permanent residence. Mr. Green says:—

"Nothing has kept back the work of improvement among the native population of the Sandwich Islands, like the frequent changes which have taken place in consequence of one and another leaving the field of his labor. Since the establishment in 1820, more than thirty adult missionaries have left their laboas in this field of toil, and returned to the United States, not one of whom has returned; and unless it be Mr. C. B. Andrews, who now leaves, not one is expected back. Of children, some fifty-five or sixty have either been sent home or have accompanied their parents, and of these three only have returned. What a loss to the people of Hawaii. How discouraging to the hearts of those remaining. What a drawback upon the labors of the mission."

A Church in Favor of Land Reform.—The following important resolutions were adopted at the Annual Conference of the Wisconsin Wesleyan Methodist Connection, August 25th:—

Resolved, 1st. That the principles of National Reform, in regard to the freedom of the public lands, are principles clearly set forth in the Bible, and that, as Christians and Christian Ministers, we are called upon to render them our entire and hearty support.

Resolved, 2d. That every non-landholder or landless person, exercising sound discretion, ought to be entitled to receive from the Government a suitable quantity of land for the support and maintenance of a family.

Resolved, 3d. That the entire homestead, together with the property thereon, ought to be exempted from seizure or forced sale, and credit be based upon moral integrity.

Resolved, 4th. That we highly approve of the course the most of our Members in Congress from this State have taken in regard to the freedom of the public lands.

HASKELL WHEELOCK, Pres.
A. P. Winslow, Scribe.

Temperance in New York.—The Secretary of the American Temperance Union delivered an address in New York on Sunday evening last, in which he portrayed the benefits of the temperance reform to this nation, in educating it anew on self-preserving and self-controlling principles, saving a vast amount of wealth, giving a new spring to every department of industry, protecting the nation from pauperism and crime, and increasing its intellectual power and its domestic comfort. He exhibited the state of the city, however, as truly appalling and alarming, there being machinery in full operation here, and for the most part under the sanction of law, which is sending degradation and misery into unnumbered families, and filling our poor-houses and jails with wretched victims. The number of places at which intoxicating drinks are sold, he stated to be 5,027. Of these, 4,145 are licensed. The number of commitments in the quarter ending June 30, was 8,214. Of these, 3,003 were for intoxication, 1,087 for disorderly conduct, 1,186 for assault and battery, and 153 for fighting in the streets—offenses usually consequent upon intoxication. In the Tenth Ward one liquor establishment is supported by every 27 families.

Notice of the Marlborough Church.—At a meeting of the Seventh-day Baptist Church at Marlborough, Salem Co., N. J., held October 6th, 1850, it was unanimously Resolved, That all non-resident members of this Church, who do not report themselves to the Church, by letter or otherwise, within one year from the above date, shall be considered as gone out from among us, and their names stricken from our records.

By order of the Church,
E. A. Crossley, Church Clerk.

Jenny Lind has been singing in Boston for two weeks past, where she was received with great enthusiasm. She gave a Charity Concert there on the evening of the 10th inst., the receipts of which, amounting to over eleven thousand dollars, were distributed by a Committee, of which Hon. Edward Everett was Chairman. Her concerts in New York are to be resumed next week.

A Fugitive Slave Arrest was made at Detroit, Mich., on the 8th inst., and created great excitement. Hundreds of negroes assembled and threatened to rescue the prisoner. They did not attempt it, however, and he was conveyed safely from the jail to the court-room, and again from the court-room to the jail, guarded by two military companies and the U. S. troops. He is to remain in jail a week awaiting evidence.

General Intelligence.

European News.

Two steamers from Liverpool—the Atlantic and the Europa—have reached New York since our last, with one week later news from Europe, the substance of which we give below.

In England, the action of the Irish Synod of Thurles, in denouncing the Queen's Colleges, continues to be a prominent subject of comment.

In France, the writers in the journals have begun to sign their articles with their names in obedience to the new law.

Austria has forbidden the moderate journals of Germany, such as the Cologne Gazette, from crossing her frontiers.

The Danish and Holstein armies have made no movement since the repulse of Gen. Willisen, an account of which we published last week.

The tide of emigration from Ireland continues to flow more vigorously than ever. Vessels freighted with emigrants, consisting chiefly of the better class of farmers, traders and mechanics, are leaving for the United States or Canada.

Intelligence has reached England that the Chamber of Deputies, at Rio Janeiro, had come to the resolution that the traffic in slaves was piracy, and that, therefore, the most stringent steps would be taken to put an end to the inhuman traffic.

By official returns, it appears that there are now upwards of 6000 miles of railroad in actual operation in the three kingdoms. On these there was a conveyance for the year ending June, 1849, of 60,398,159 passengers.

There are employed in the yearly transit of Great Britain with the world and with her own shores, 33,672 sailing vessels, and 1110 steam vessels, employing 236,000 seamen.

The annual loss of property in British shipping wrecked or foundered at sea, may be assumed as amounting to nearly three millions of pounds sterling.

Baron Rothschild has denied giving a letter of introduction to Haynau to Messrs. Barclay and Perkins.

Some of the leading artists of England, as well as many amateurs and admirers of the fine arts, consider that the forthcoming exhibition in Hyde Park would be a fitting opportunity for discussing the subject of costume. Artists, and all persons of true taste, have long complained of the inelegance and incongruity of English and other modern costumes.

Before leaving Liverpool, the subject of the ragged schools was introduced to the notice of Mdle. Lind by Mrs. Bald, the wife of the Swedish Consul, and the kind-hearted songstress handed to this lady the sum of £100 as a contribution to the funds of the Soho-street Institution.

The ship North Atlantic sailed from Liverpool on the morning of the 4th of September, carrying 357 souls of the Latter-day Saints, under the presidency of Elder David Sudworth. Their destination is the Great Salt Lake Valley, via New Orleans, St. Louis, and Council Bluffs. The ship James Pennell was to sail on the 2d inst., with a full complement of Saints, bound for the same destination. Another ship will leave with a load of Welsh Saints toward the middle of this month.

The Bouelta brigantine arrived at Portsmouth on Saturday from the coast of Africa, where she has been nearly three years in commission. Her commander, Lieut. Forbes, has been employed during the past year in negotiating with the King of Dahomey, in the endeavor to establish a treaty for the abolition of the slave trade, throughout his territory, but failed. His Majesty reviewed his troops during Commodore Forbes' sojourn with him, and they are spoken of as well-disciplined, though 4,000 out of 10,000 of the soldiery are women clothed as men, who perform their military duties in every respect as well as their male companions in arms. His majesty, as a mark of especial favor, presented Commodore Forbes with a juvenile princess, aged 7 years, whom he has brought to England to be educated. At the "Customs" (a sort of religious rite) 30 human sacrifices were offered to their deity, two of these (soldiers from Attaphme, aged respectively 40 and 50,) Commander Forbes purchased for $100, and sent to Fernando Po to be liberated. The slave trade was very brisk, and the squadron very healthy.

Lake Ontario crossed in an Open Boat during a Storm.

On Wednesday last, says the Rochester Advertiser of Oct. 8, as one of the heaviest gales of the season was sweeping over the broad bosom of Lake Ontario, the little schooner Prosperity was riding safely at anchor under the Canada shore, at the mouth of Duffin's Creek, about 25 miles east of Toronto. The Prosperity was manned by Capt. Harrington, the owner, his boy, and one man, and although a small crew in number, they were equal to their task, as the sequel will show. Some ship stores being wanted, the Captain and crew went on shore in their only small boat (a flat bottomed scow about 15 feet long and 4 feet wide, commonly called a punt) to procure them. By the time they were ready to return to the schooner, the wind had greatly increased in violence, but this did not deter them from attempting the passage. They put off from the shore in their frail craft, which soon became unmanageable to a great extent, and they were carried past the vessel into the Lake, despite of all their efforts. The people on the shore who saw them were unable to render any assistance, and of course gave them up for lost. Not so with Capt. Harrington; he resolved to make the most he could of his craft, and test his power as a navigator. Many brave men would have despaired at such a time, and with such prospects; a wide waste of waters before, lashed into fury by the violent "Nor'wester" from behind, and only a miserable wooden trough, without sail, and poorly supplied with oars, between him and the tumbling waves that threatened momentarily to engulf. Capt. H. saw that his only chance of safety was in running directly before the wind and waves. He ordered his man and boy to lie down in the bottom of the punt, and thus trim it as well as possible, while he took an oar and steered the little bark before the gale. She dashed on amid the white-caps, laboring hard to withstand the fury of the waves, which she nobly braved for eleven hours—long hours to the captain, who sat at the steering oar, and his companions, who were lying in the bottom of the boat, expecting every moment to be engulfed by each wave which rolled successively by. After eleven hours of anxiety and imminent danger thus passed, the captain discovered the American shore, and effected a landing in safety at great hazard.

Capt. Harrington, on making a head reckoning, found himself sixteen miles east of Niagara River, having drifted across the Lake a little west of the widest part. He had probably sailed fifty miles in his frail craft, amid a heavy storm—a feat, we think, unparalleled in the history of Lake navigation.

Recent Sabbath Accidents.

On Saturday afternoon, Oct. 5, about 3 o'clock, as two ladies were getting out of an omnibus at the corner of Fulton and High streets, Brooklyn, they were knocked down and run over by a runaway horse, attached to an ice cart. Both ladies were seriously injured.

On Saturday, Oct. 5, a man who resides at the corner of Hoyt and Douglass streets, Brooklyn, attempted to cross the track of the Long Island Railroad with a horse and wagon. The train was coming on at the time at about the usual rate of speed, and the horse getting fractious at the noise of the locomotive, became unmanageable, obstinately keeping in the track until the train came up and in contact with the vehicle, which was smashed and the horse killed. The man was thrown out by the concussion and seriously injured.

On Saturday, Oct. 5, an accident occurred with the gravel train on the New York and Erie Railroad, in the vicinity of the Delaware River. It appears that the train was coming down the road at a rapid speed, when the axle-tree of one of the dirt cars suddenly gave way, and precipitated all the laborers on the cars to the ground, one of whom was fatally injured. He received a severe compound fracture in the thigh, and had both legs horribly crushed.

A dispatch from Paducah, Ky., says that on Saturday, (Sabbath,) Oct. 5, the steamboat Kate Fleming, Capt. Dunham, from Louisville for Cairo, burst both her boilers, and afterwards burnt to the water's edge. The accident occurred near Walker's Bar, where she had grounded but had got off when the bell rang to slacken, and the explosion occurred, caused, it is thought, by want of water. Ten are reported killed and missing, seven or eight wounded, among them the Captain dangerously, and 19 are reported badly burned. Capt. Dunham and seven others were on the hurricane deck at the time of the accident, and were blown several feet into the air. Some fell on the wreck, others in the water, who were saved by swimming. The safe, containing a large amount of money belonging to the boat, and the deposits of passengers, was lost.

Sudden Deaths at Kalamazoo, Mich.—A tea party was recently given at the Kalamazoo Exchange, and a number of the persons who attended it died in a short time from poison, as was supposed. But a dispatch from Detroit, dated Fifth day, Oct. 10, says: "The bodies of those persons who have died since the tea party given at Kalamazoo Exchange have been exhumed by our first physicians, and they report that no poison existed in their stomachs. They declared it to be their belief that it was cholera. The Jury's verdict was 'Death by some violent disease, to them unknown, generally supposed to be cholera.' It is now confined to a German family who recently emigrated to this place. It is thought by some that they brought the disease with them, part of them having stopped at the Kalamazoo Exchange and unpacked their goods. They numbered about 35, occupying a very small room; five of them have died, and four more are very sick. The deaths from the commencement have been 17 or 18."

The Flight of Fugitive Slaves from Boston.—"For no sufficient reason that we can see," says the Boston Traveler, "there seems to be considerable panic among the fugitive slaves who have been, some of them for a number of years, quiet residents of this city. There is yet no evidence of any attempt to seize them, and it is hardly probable that any will ever be made. We learn, however, that quite a number of families in this city, where either the father or mother are fugitives, have been broken up, and the furniture sold off, with the view of leaving for safer quarters in Nova Scotia or Canada. In one case a husband, whose wife is a fugitive, and, who with their three children born here, are liable to be taken back, have by fear of what may happen, been obliged to break up their home, and will probably seek a refuge in the British Provinces."

Dreadful Mortality.—In the township of Hartland, Huron county, Ohio, the dysentery is raging with great malignity. In one school district, occupying a sand ridge hitherto esteemed the healthiest part of the township, there have been 26 deaths within a few weeks—one out of six of the population. Hardly a family has escaped, and in many there have been three or four deaths. The duration of the sickness is usually five or six days, but medical skill seems entirely unavailing. A physician of the neighborhood informs us that the disease appears to be contagious. It prevails in the sandstone region, near the Vermilion river, quite generally, but with varying severity. Lorain county was similarly affected last year, but during the present season the localities hitherto scourged are exempt, while in those which escaped a year since, it now prevails.

Poultry near New York.—Officer Friend arrested a colored man named Zebulon Francis, on a charge of stabbing and shooting chickens in the neighborhood of Gowanus, in the Eighth Ward of Brooklyn, L. I. The manner in which he accomplished the theft is quite ingenious, and consisted in decoying them into the adjacent woods, with corn stolen from the farmers' shocks, and afterwards shooting them. It is said to be an utter impossibility to keep any kind of poultry whatever in the outer wards of the city. Last year the depredators used fish hooks hidden in Indian meal to catch the bipeds. Francis was committed for examination.

A Lost Child Found.—Some five years since, says the N. Y. Tribune, a poor woman of the name of Moore, sent her child, then about eight years of age, to the grocery, since which time all attempts to find her whereabouts have proved abortive. A few days since the now grown up girl was recognized by one of her old playmates, in a grocery store upon an errand from the family in which she resided as a domestic. Her playmate asked her why she did not go home to her parents; she burst into tears, and replied, that she did not know where to find them—that they were dead, &c. The young friend watched her to her place of residence, in Eighth-street, and urged her to go home. The mother being apprised of the circumstances, immediately sought out her child, who gives the following history of the case. When she first approached the grocery, she was accosted by a man, who enticed her to go with him in a wagon. She lived with his family (they had no children) near Tarrytown, upward of two years, when they packed up their goods, &c., and stated that they were going to live out West. She did not wish to go, and fled to a neighboring farmer's house, where she found protection and a home. She remained upward of two years with this family, when she came to the city, and was living as a domestic when discovered as described. The mother and father could not recognize the child, but the child at once recognized them. Their happiness was complete.

The Pawtucket Bank.—The Providence Post says that the Cashier of the Pawtucket Bank, which recently broke, had loaned the credit of the Bank in the form of checks on other Banks, payable on time, to a very large amount, variously stated from $70,000, to a single individual, and that there was other indebtedness, with entirely insufficient security, to the amount of $20,000. Such was the panic that the bills in some cases were sold at a great discount. We are credibly informed, however, that the individual for whose benefit the credit of the Bank has been so fraudulently extended, will at once secure the Bank against loss, and from present indications, there is little reason to doubt that the bills will all be redeemed; and from information we have been at some pains to obtain, we would recommend to all holders not to sacrifice on them. Great Mail Robbery.—A telegraphic dispatch to the N. Y. Tribune, dated Philadelphia, Sunday, Oct. 13, says: Three Post Office pouches were stolen last night, all made up in New York yesterday afternoon one for Wheeling, supposed to contain all letters from that place to St. Louis and intermediate points; one to Richmond, Va., and one to Wilmington, N. C. The Postmaster has recovered about a bushel of opened letters and several checks and drafts. All the letters containing money were carried off. It is not known how the bags were stolen from the mail cars, nor is there any clue to the thieves. The robbery took place between the Depot and Gray's Ferry. The Mail Agent is much censured. The amount of money stolen is variously estimated at from $20,000 to $30,000.

Emigration to California Overland.—A letter from Fort Laramie, dated 26th August, says that the tide of emigration has almost ceased. The Mormon emigration this year is estimated at 5,000. The Register this season exhibits the number of emigrants as 39,500 men; 2,500 women; 600 children; 23,000 horses; 8,000 mules; 36,000 oxen; 7,000 cows; 9,000 wagons. Deaths en route 316. It is estimated that one-fifth did not register their names. The emigrants suffered much for food and by loss of animals; 1,000 would not cover the deaths between Missouri and Sacramento Valley. Small-pox is prevailing among the Sioux.

SUMMARY.

A Whisky Row occurred at a logging bee near Peterboro' last week, says the Oswego Com. Times of the 9th. A man named Finegan killed another man named O'Boyle, because he interfered to stop a fight; a boy, McGlin, broke his leg in running for the doctor; and a man named McCaul, while chasing the murderer on horseback, was thrown, and so seriously injured that his life is despaired of. Of course Whisky should be held responsible for all these calamities.

Miscellaneous.

Scenes on Board a Slave Ship.

Preparations were actively resumed for the reception of the slaves, and in a few hours after the captain's visit to the shore several boat-loads of unhappy wretches were sent on board. The first comers were taken below the berth-deck and arranged upon a temporary slave-deck placed over the water-casks, and at a distance of not more than three feet and a half from the deck overhead. Into the planks eye-bolts were inserted, and firmly secured at different intervals, in four rows, running fore and aft the ship. Through these bolts traversed iron shackle bars, which were prevented from slipping by a knob at one end and a padlock at the other. When the padlock was removed the bar could be shoved back, and the slaves strung upon it in gangs of five, six, or eight in number. The shackle was a stout piece of iron, curved like a horse-shoe, with holes in the ends for the bar to pass through. Each slave had one of these shackles placed over his ankle; the long bar was drawn through the ends of it along the under side of his leg, and so on of each slave belonging to the gang; the end of the bar was then passed through the eye-bolt and secured by a padlock. This arrangement made it very convenient to air the slaves on deck, when the weather would permit. All that was necessary was to remove the lock, slide the bar back, and slip the shackles off, when the limbs of the whole gang were at once unfettered. After their airing they could be strung along on the bar, and the end of it again secured with hardly more time or trouble.

The slaves, as I have said, were arranged in four ranks. When lying down, the heads of the two outer ranks touched the sides of the ship; their feet pointing inboard or athwart the vessel. They, of course, occupied a space fore and aft the ship of about six feet on either side, or twelve feet of the whole breadth. At the feet of the outside rank came the heads of the inner row. They took up a space of six feet more on either side, or together twelve feet. There was still left a space running up and down the centre of the deck, two or three feet in breadth; along this were stretched single slaves, between the feet of the two inner rows, so that when all were lying down almost every square foot of the deck was covered with a mass of human flesh. Not the slightest space was allowed between the individuals of the ranks, but the whole were packed as closely as they could be, each slave having just room enough to stretch himself out flat upon his back and no more. In this way about two hundred and fifty were crowded upon the slave-deck, and as many more upon the berth-deck.

Horrible as this may seem, it was nothing compared to the "packing" generally practiced by slavers. Captain Garbez boasted that he had tried both systems, tight packing and loose packing, thoroughly, and that he had found the latter the best.

"If you call this loose packing," I replied, "have the goodness to explain what you mean by tight packing."

"Why, tight packing consists in making a row sit with their legs stretched apart, and then another row is placed between their legs, and so on, until the whole deck is filled. In the one case each slave has as much room as he can cover lying; in the other, only as much room as he can occupy sitting. With tight packing this craft ought to stow fifteen hundred." About fifty of the whole number were females, who were left unshackled, but were closely confined in a small space at the stern, which was cut off from the apartment of the males by a stout bulkhead.

* * *

In five days the complement of slaves was on board and all ready for departure. In a few hours we were dancing upon the lively swell of the open ocean. As night set in the wind freshened, with a short, quick head-sea, through which the ship, under full sail, ploughed her uneasy way. As the motion increased, the most heart-rending sounds began to issue from between her decks. They grew stronger and stronger—blending with, and almost overpowering the creaking of spars and bulkheads, and the melancholy wail of the breeze among the taughtened cords of the weather rigging. A deep, dull chorus of moans, and sobs, and sighs, arose from the grated hatchways, spread around upon the air, and enwrapped the cursed craft in all the harmonies of hell. It was the shrill cry of youth, and the sobbing voices of woman in the hour of fright and distress. It was the deep groans of manhood, wrung by pain from the panting breast. It was the choking sobs of oppressed respiration—the retchings of nausea—the clanking of fetters, and the stentorous gaspings of wretches in the last agonies of death.

The next morning five corpses were picked out from among the men, and two from among the women, and thrown overboard.

"Only seven!" exclaimed the captain, "well, that's devilish good luck so far. I always calculate, with a full cargo, to lose from fifteen to twenty by the first touch of sea-sickness. Come, bear a hand there, and give them an airing!"

From forty to fifty at a time were now brought upon deck. As they emerged from the hatchway they were manacled together in gangs of six or eight, as much to prevent individuals from jumping overboard as to guard against resistance. Each gang was then placed in turn on the forecastle, the brakes of a force pump manned, and a powerful stream of water directed through a hose upon them. After being thoroughly drenched, they were allowed to walk about and dry themselves for fifteen or twenty minutes, and were then passed down to their shackles, to be succeeded by another set.

Never, but in a slaver, were seen such groups of woe-begone wretches. Many were ill with previous disease, and all of them laboring under the distressing effects of sea-sickness; their naked bodies begrimed with filth, shivered and shrunk in the cool fresh air, and their quivering lips and rolling eyes expressed the height of bodily suffering, mental agony, and hopeless despair. There was none of that stolid indifference which had characterized the expression of their faces on shore. There, cruelty and hardship had assumed familiar forms, and a dogged endurance opposed itself to the frowns of fate. Here they were upon a new and fearful element—new terrors aroused their jaded and sluggish fears—new pangs developed the secret sensations of their benumbed and hardened frames. Alas! they were only at the commencement of their fearful voyage—at the threshold merely of the horrors that were to multiply, in geometric ratio, the further they advanced.

I attempted to visit the slave-decks. The sights, sounds and smells were intolerable; and, with a death-like sickness at the heart, I was compelled to retire. "Good heavens!" I exclaimed, "I had no idea of this!"

"Why, it is n't very pleasant," said the captain, "but what can you expect when they are all sea-sick? Wait till they get over that, and we shall be able to keep them in better order; and, besides, they'll naturally thin out a little, and that will make them more comfortable."

"But if such is the state of things in fair weather," I demanded, "how will it be if it should come on to blow?"

"If it is a downright regular gale, we shall have a terrible time, of course," replied the captain. "When it comes to closing the hatches, it is all up with the voyage. You can hardly save enough to pay expenses. They die like leeches in a thunder-storm. I was once in a little schooner with three hundred on board, and we were compelled to lie-to for three days. It was the worst sea I ever saw, and came near swamping us several times. We lost two hundred and fifty slaves in that gale. We could n't get at the dead ones to throw them overboard very handily, and so those that did'nt die from want of air were killed by the rolling and tumbling about of the corpses. Of the living ones, some had their limbs broken, and every one had the flesh of his legs worn to the bone by the shackle-irons."

"Good God! and you still pursue the horrible trade!"

"Certainly: why not? Despite of accidents, the trade is profitable, and for the cruelty of it, no one is to blame except the English. Were it not for them, large and roomy vessels would be employed, and it would be an object to bring the slaves over with every comfort, and in as good condition as possible. Now every consideration must be sacrificed to the one great object—escape from capture by the British cruisers.

I had no wish to reply to the captain's argument. One might as well reply to a defence of blasphemy or murder. Giddy, faint and sick, I turned with loathing from the fiends in human guise.

Two weeks of fine weather, but with rather unfavorable winds, brought us to the line, which was crossed in about five or six degrees of longitude west.

The slaves had become by this time somewhat used to the motion of the ship, and the mortality had diminished from five or six to one or two in the twenty-four hours. They were regularly aired and washed every day, and had pretty good food, though rather a short allowance of it; but although every care possible was taken to preserve their health, even to administering to them at regular intervals brimstone and molasses, and other slave-ship prescriptions of supposed efficacy, nothing could compensate for the injurious effects of confinement in a close and vitiated atmosphere. They grew weaker and weaker, and their bodies rapidly reached a state of distressing emaciation. Putrid sores and malignant eruptions broke out upon them; in some cases old wounds, that had been healed for years, reopened, assuming a peculiarly unhealthy aspect; in others, a virulent ophthalmia completely destroyed the tissues of the eye. Many became afflicted with scrofula, developing itself in tubercular phthisis, or in swellings and ulcerations of the glandular system, and many were attacked with pneumonia, terminating, in the case of one poor fellow, in that most loathsome form of disease—gangrene of the lungs. Nothing can equal the horrible odor of the expectorations in this disease; and to get rid of the offensive smell, which, with its kindred perfumes, seemed to permeate every pore of the ship, the sick man was brought up at night, and coolly thrown overboard—alive!

The day succeeding, a violent gale sprung up from the south-west. Each moment heavy masses of water tumbled aboard of us, shaking the ship throughout every fibre of her frame, and flooding her decks, so that the fore and main hatches had to be closed, cutting off the supply of air for more than four hundred breathing beings except what could find its way down the after-hatch.

In ten or twelve hours the gale abated; the wind shifted to the east, and the heavy sea gradually subsided. The hatches were now opened, and more than thirty dead bodies picked out from among the mass of human beings, and thrown overboard. But, although without the elements had ceased their strife for the dominion of nature, within, the effects of the contest were only beginning to develop themselves. Owing, undoubtedly, to their close confinement during the gale in the vitiated air between decks, the eyes of nearly one-half the slaves became affected simultaneously with acute and painful inflammation. It was purulent ophthalmia in its most virulent form. There had been a few cases previous to the storm, but the disease then was limited in its progress, and assumed a milder and less malignant character.

It was wonderful, the rapidity with which it ran its course. In some cases not three days would elapse from the first symptoms, until the eyelids would be swelled to an enormous extent—the lower one so much so as, to rest—a huge mass of disease—upon the cheek. Ulcerations of the cornea, and the utter disorganization of the ball of the eye, was, in most cases, the result. Fever, violent pains in the head, and, in many cases, the most excruciating pains in the eye, from the motion of the upper eyelid over the ulcerated corner, where the conjunctiva had been abraded or absorbed, accompanied the disease. In three days one hundred slaves had lost an eye, and more than twenty, deprived of both eyes, were irrecoverably blind.

I exerted myself to the utmost to alleviate their sufferings, but my best efforts were of little avail. No form of medical treatment seemed adapted to the case, and the disease only ran a more rapid race when any attempts were made to arrest it. I had nothing, however, to reproach myself with on that score, for I felt the conviction, that under all the attending circumstances, the most powerful medicines in the most skillful hands would have been administered in vain.

Emerging from the fore hatch-way, after a useless visit to the unfortunates below, I observed some of the sailors engaged in slinging several twelve pound shots to pieces of rope two or three feet in length.

It was just at day break, that while lying in my berth, my attention was aroused by some sounds on the forward deck. I heard a confused noise—a number of voices speaking together in rather a low key, and then a shrill cry of pain and fright, followed by a plunge of some heavy body into the water. In a minute or two the sounds were repeated. Again and again they struck upon my ear. "What devil's work is going on now?" I exclaimed, jumping from my berth and stepping out upon deck.

A dense fog brooded upon the surface of the ocean, and closely enveloped the ship—standing up on either side, like huge perpendicular walls of granite, and leaving a comparatively clear space—the area of the deck and the height of the main top-mast cross-tress. In-board, the sight ranged nearly free fore-and-aft the ship, but sea-ward, no eye could penetrate, more than a yard or two, the solid-looking barrier of vapor. A man standing at the taffrail might have seen the cat-heads the whole length of the deck, while at the same time behind him the end of the spanker-boom, projecting over the water, was lost in the mist. I looked up at the perpendicular walls, and the lofty arch overhead, with feelings of awe, and, I may add, fear. Cursed, indeed, must be our craft, when the genius of the mist so carefully avoided the pollution of actual contact. His rolling legions were close around us, but vapory horse and misty foot shrunk back affrighted from the horrors of our blood-stained decks.

The cause of the phenomenon, I concluded to be, the hot air generated in the crowded space between decks, but I had not time for much speculation as to the precise manner of its action. The same shrill cry and heavy plunging sound was repeated, and turning in the direction from whence it came, I saw a sight that riveted every faculty. A slave was standing amid a group of sailors, one of whom was busy fastening to his leg one of the twelve-pound balls that I had noticed the day before. When this was done, four men standing upon a grating, raised a foot or two from the deck, seized him on either side, and elevating him with a dexterous jerk, pitched him head first over the bulwark. His wild shriek of fear, when he found himself going, was hardly commenced before it was stifled by the waters closing over his head. Another succeeded, and again another.

"Are you sure that there are no more!" demanded Monte, who superintended the operation.

"All at present," responded a sailor; "there is a dozen more that will have to go to-morrow; but we may as well let them have their chance out."

And this was the fate of the blind! Of what value is a slave who has lost his sight? None! He is worth less than nothing! He is an incumbrance—a useless expense—an unsaleable article. Pitch him overboard! twenty-five to-day, and "a dozen more to-morrow!" [Kaloolah.

Wreck of the Isaac Mead.

A gentleman who was on board the Isaac Mead when she was run into and sunk by the steamer Southerner, on the 5th inst., gives the following account of the matter, through the N. Y. Tribune:—

I was lying awake in my state-room, when I heard the watch on deck giving order to the helmsman to steer to the windward of a vessel, which order seemed to be obeyed. In a moment after, the order was countermanded, as the vessel appeared to be crossing our track. Springing up, I commenced dressing, but just as I took my coat and vest up to put them on, the watch cried out that the vessel would be into us. At the same time he hailed her to steer away; but before the sound of his voice had ceased, the vessel, which proved to be the steamer Southerner, struck us on our bowsprit, which, acting as a lever, pried the bow of the bark wide open. I called out to learn whether there was any danger, and the first answer came that there was none; but some one immediately cried that she was sinking. By this time I was dressed, and running upon deck, where the passengers were fast assembling, several of us engaged for a moment in trying to launch a life-boat, which hung on the starboard side, but before she was unlashed the bow of the bark was deep under water, and none of us were able to stand. The ladies were all terrified, screaming for help and mercy; yet only one man seemed to lose command of himself. Those who could, immediately jumped overboard, and commenced swimming to get away from the vessel before she went down; but no one had time to seize a plank or any thing with which to sustain himself. The vessel was so nearly perpendicular that I slid down to the mainmast, where, catching hold of a settee, I drew myself with all my might toward the stern in order to jump overboard. But I had scarcely time to catch hold of the rigging of the mizzenmast before she went down, and the cries for help were drowned in the rush of waters made by the bark's sinking. As we went down, I commenced drawing myself up by the rigging, and when I had cleared myself from that, I continued to descend, being drawn down by the sinking vessel. Exerting myself to rise to the surface, till after what seemed to me an age, I felt that I was no longer descending, since the rush of waters had ceased. Although I ascended rapidly, I was so long under water that I was in a nearly exhausted condition when I gained the surface. As soon as I had cleared my stomach and lungs of water, I looked around to see where the steamer was, which had floated far to the south-east. About a hundred yards to the south-west, I observed, several things afloat towards which I started, and for the first fifteen minutes had nothing to support myself with. I then found a board about three feet long and two feet wide, on which I rested for a moment, and took the first long breath. During all this time, the cries of those who were trying to sustain themselves were most heart-rending, and loud above all the others was clearly distinguished that of a female. I tried to throw off my coat and boots, but finding it impossible, turned out of my course to try to render aid to the lady. When near enough to see her, I called out to her to take courage, telling her that I would soon be with her; also not to spend her strength by calling for help, but to hold firmly to her plank, since she would soon be saved. She replied that her strength was almost gone, and that unless she was soon saved it would be to late. At the same time, a man, a few yards from her, rolled off his plank but whether he was previously dead or not could not be ascertained; he neither struggled nor gave a sound, but immediately disappeared. The sea rolled so heavily, I could scarcely swim against it, and it was at this time that some of the floating planks or timbers struck against my side and arm, and threw me under water. Recovering myself, however, I turned to look at the lady, who was then being carried on the top of a high wave, and holding firmly to her plank; it rolled with her and she went under. But by an almost superhuman effort, she recovered her position on the plank again, and commenced calling for aid. She soon lost her hold again and went down, but rising asked me to help her, as she should go down, and when almost near enough to reach her plank, she gradually relaxed her hold, and with one long gurgling cry disappeared for ever. For the first time I felt desolate and disheartened, fearing the steamer was going to leave us, and looked toward the land, but none could be seen. Another man, soon after, went down near me, crying for help and mercy, and I began to think my last hour was at hand. Suffice it to say, that after being in the water for more then three quarters of an hour, I was rescued by the steamer's boats, yet, sad to relate, only nine were left to tell the mournful tale, twenty-four having gone to their final account. Of these, one was the child of the above mentioned lady, which the steward, with praiseworthy humanity, carried through the waves, swimming with one hand, till no signs of life appearing, he left it. The steward was picked up in an exhausted state.

The Captain was drawn under water by some one who seized him by the hand, and who came near drowning him. Almost immediately after this he was seized again by the breast, and in disengaging himself had to tear off his clothes. After recovering himself, however, he swam away for the steamer, and finding a plank managed to save himself. The rest of the crew, and the remaining passengers, met with no particular incidents. All being roused from their sleep, no one had time to save anything, and many passengers never got out of the cabin.

The Great Explosion at Seaford, Eng.

Great excitement was caused at Seaford, on Thursday, that being the day when an explosion of a part of the Cliff took place, as had been previously announced. Seaford is twelve miles from Brighton, and about five from Beachy Head. The sea having gradually encroached upon the land, it was determined to throw down a part of the cliff, so as to form a barrier against its future ravages. For this purpose, 55 of the Royal Sappers and Miners have been engaged for the last seven weeks making the necessary preparations.

The cliff was perforated in various places with tunnels and shafts, and in each of two chambers excavated for the purpose a charge of 12,000 lbs. of gunpowder was deposited. By 3 o'clock, the hour fixed for the explosion, about 10,000 people had assembled, and means were taken to keep them at a proper distance beyond the reach of danger. The gunpowder being fired by voltaic batteries at twelve minutes past 3, suddenly the whole cliff, along a width or frontage of some 120 feet, bent forward toward the sea, cracked in every direction, crumbled into pieces, and fell upon the beach in front of it, forming a bank, down which large portions of the falling mass glided slowly into the sea for several yards, like a stream of lava flowing into the water.

The whole multitude upon the beach seemed for a few moments paralyzed and awe struck by the strange movement, and the slightly trembling ground. There was no very loud report; the rumbling noise was probably not heard a mile off, and was perhaps caused by the splitting of the cliff and fall of the fragments. There seemed to be no smoke, but there was a tremendous shower of dust. Those who were in boats a little way out, state that they felt a slight shock. It was much stronger on the top of the cliff. Persons standing there felt staggered by the shaking of the ground, and one of the batteries was thrown down by it. In Seaforth, too, three quarters of a mile off, glasses upon the table were shaken, and one chimney fell. At Newhaven, a distance of three miles, the shock was sensibly felt.

In a few moments after the cliff had fallen the crowd upon the beach rushed forward to it. A second fall of chalk, when they had got half way, checked them for an instant, and but for an instant. They rushed up the mound which the exploded chalk had formed. Although it is a mass of large rough stones for the most part, difficult in many places to climb, except by using one's hands as well as feet, yet ladies eagerly clambered up it, and one gentleman managed to get his horse up. The mass which came down is larger than was expected; it forms an irregular heap, apparently about 300 feet broad, of a hight varying from 40 to 100 feet, and extending 200 or 250 feet more seaward, which is conciderably beyond low-water mark. It is thought that it comprises nearly 300,000 tuns. The operation is considered to have been decidedly successful.

Coffins of the Chaldeans.

Mr. Kennet Loftus, the first European who has visited the ancient ruins of Warka, in Mesopatamia, and who is attached to the surveying staff of Colonel Williams, appointed to settle the question of the boundary line between Turkey and Persia, writes thus:—"Warka is no doubt the Erech of Scripture, the second city of Nimrod, and it is the Orchoe of the Chaldees. The mounds within the walls afford subjects of high interest to the historian and antiquary; they are filled, nay, I may say they are literally composed of coffins, piled upon each other to the hight of forty-five feet. It has evidently been the great burial place of generations of Chaldeans, as Meshad Ali and Kerbella at the present day are of the Persians. The coffins are very strange affairs; they are in general form like a slipper bath, but more depressed and symmetrical, with a large oval aperture to admit the body, which is closed with a lid of earthenware. The coffins themselves are also of baked clay, covered with green glaze, and embossed with figures of warriors, with strange and enormous coiffures, dressed in a short tunic and long under garments, a sword by the side, the arms resting on the hips, the legs apart. Great quantities of pottery, and also clay figures, some most delicately modeled, are found among them; and ornaments of gold, silver, iron, copper, glass, &c., within. [Art Journal.

The Rapids of the Jordan.

It had been ascertained that the Dead Sea was more than 1,000 feet below the level of the lake of Tiberias. As the distance between the two was but 60 miles, this would give a fall of about 20 feet per mile—greater, it was then thought, than any river in the world exhibited. The Mohawk river in America was held to be one of the greatest fall, and that averages not more than four or five feet to the mile; but it is now known that the Sacramento in California has a fall of 2,000 feet in 20 miles, or an average of 100 feet to a mile. It was then, however, thought that such a fall as it seemed necessary to suppose in the Jordan, from the difference of level between the two lakes which it connected, was without example; and as its course was deemed tolerably straight, and as it was not known to contain any rapids, an error in the calculation of the difference of level between the two lakes was more than suspected. The problem it was left for Lieut. Lynch to set at rest. In the first place, the river is full of rapids—the boats plunged down no less than twenty-seven very threatening ones, besides a great number of lesser magnitude; and then, although the direct distance does not, as stated, exceed sixty miles, the course of the river is made at least two hundred miles by the exceedingly tortuous course of the stream. This reduces the fall to not more than six feet in the mile, for which the numerous rapids in the river sufficiently account.

The wide and deeply depressed plain or valley (Ghor) through which the river flows, is generally barren, treeless, and verdureless; and the mountains, or rather cliffs and slopes, of the river uplands present, for the most part, a wild and cheerless aspect."

Experimental Preaching.

Every minister of the Gospel should have an experimental knowledge of the truth which he preaches, so far as that truth has a personal application. Nothing can compensate for the want of such knowledge. No borrowed phraseology, no artificial fervor, no rhetorical art, can supply the place of heart-experience. The sanctified heart is quick to detect the lack of experimental piety in one who attempts to minister to its edification. The severest criticism ever made upon preaching is, the complaint of the more devout and spiritual hearers that "they are not fed." A venerable lady, whose Christian experience had been matured under the faithful preaching of the Word, being deprived of the privilege of attending the house of God, engaged her grandson, a gay and impenitent youth, to read to her the sermons of the most eminent divines of Great Britain and America. The young man finding this employment irksome, sought to divert himself by imposing upon his grandmother a composition of his own, which, to do him justice, was a very well written discourse, arranged according to the usual method of exposition, argument and application. The old lady listened attentively, and asked again and again the name of the author—a question which the reader as often evaded. When the sermon was finished, the young man was eager to get his grandmother's opinion of its merits. "How do you like the sermon, grandmother?" "O, pretty well." "Is it not a very good sermon?" "Why—yes—'tis a good sermon, very well written, but it seems to me there isn't much Holy Ghost in it." That is poor preaching which betrays such a deficiency. The preacher should always infuse into his sermon his own heart, sanctified and enlivened by the Spirit of God; this is the true unction; this the demonstration of the Spirit and of power. Valuable Mineral Paint Discovery.

On the west side of Agawam River, in West Springfield, near the Falls and Factories, a quarry of stone material, suitable for paint, has resently been discovered and purchased by Skimer & Hancox. The premises consist of a high bluff of four or five acres, on the top of which Springfield may be plainly seen. The tract contains an inexhutible supply of the material, which is a soft, reddish brown stone, with some veins of blue, which when exposed to the air slacks or softens, and crumbles. To prepare it for mixing with oil, like lead, it is first washed, then ground. Nothing of the kind, beside this, has been found in this vicinity. According to Dr. Jackson's analysis, it contains a larger portion of the hardening qualities, than any paint material yet known. It is consequently more impervious to fire and water. We have seen some specimens of it, painted on wood and dry, and it looks well. The cost is not half as much as lead, and it is thought to be more durable, beside its protection against fire and water. Should this material prove to be what is now believed of it, by those who have examined it, the result will be fortunate for our community, and a source of profit to our enterprising proprietors. Similar discoveries at the west have been already favorably introduced to the public; but this one in West Springfield presents, as we have said, more substantial qualities for the use to which it is found adapted, than any other discovery of the kind yet made known.

Isle of Shoals.—The census of these Islands has just been taken by the Marshals of New-Hampshire and Maine. One of them reports that the inhabitants of these islands, are about as hardy a race of men a scan be found in the world. The islands themselves, situated ten miles out in the ocean, are nothing but a mass of bristling rocks, on which nothing but a few potatoes are raised. In severe storms from the east, when the surf dashes up to a great hight, the keeper of the outer light house boards up his windows and chimney, takes in his pig and cow, and lives a "retired" life, till fairer weather. The population subsists wholly by fishing.

Important Suit.—The Bunker Hill Aurora states that a Mr. Haskell of that city has commenced a suit at law to obtain possession of a large portion of the town of Yarmouth, Nova Scotia, which he claims as an heir of his grandfather, who emigrated from Marblehead, Mass., before the American Revolution, and bought the land from the British Government, and died in possession of the same; but the land was wrongfully kept by his widow, and descended to her children by his first marriage, who were then in this country, and to whom it rightfully belonged. Yarmouth is a flourishing port of entry on the western extremity of Novia Scota, and contains about five thousand inhabitants.

LONDON, Aug. 19, 1850.

My visit is drawing rapidly to a close, and a few days more will see me on my return voyage. The two or three weeks since my return from Paris have been spent in reviewing what I had seen, and paying final visits to the friends I have acquired while here. Part of the time I have spent in survey and on the borders of Kent—"the garden of England." There is a peculiar beauty in rural England, quiet and tamed as it were—the trimmed hedges, the green shadowed lanes, with here and there a park, breaking in a slight degree the monotony of the cultivated fields stretching away for miles till lost in the blue mist. It is now in the height of the harvest, the golden wheat waiting in gathered sheaves, and the trees looking dull and dry in the summer sun. It appears widely different from the freshness and verdancy of its garb when I was there before in June. I spent an exceedingly pleasant month in Kiegate, just as the trees were bursting into full foliage, and vegetation was coming into vigorous life. It was doubly interesting then, for it was the season of the birds and flowers, which had become associated with the early dreams and imaginings of the mother country. Then recurred to me, with redoubled distinctness, the tales which, when a child, I delighted to hear again and again, and while I smiled at the unhesitating belief my mind reposed in them, I venerated them too much for the pleasure they gave to disturb the impressions they had left. In a green lawn where I worked, there used to come a little redbreast, hopping familiarly up to within a few feet of me, and picking up the crumbs I threw out to him, would fly up into the hedge and trill his sharp little note a moment and dart away again. Nothing would have induced me to disturb or frighten him—the recollection of the "Babes in the Wood', would have saved him, if his own quaint and touching way had not. At every step in my walks I met with objects familiar as "household words." The timid little forget-me-not bewilderd the eye with its profusion of blue flowers springing in the green banks—the pansy—the daisy, thick springing with the red poppies in the grass of the meadows and hay-fields—and the wild hyacinth, profusely scattered in the borders of the fields, while in the shadowed nooks might be found some late violets. There the heath bloomed with the gorgeous yellow gorse filling the air with its delicious fragrance—the broom, no less beautiful, and scarcely less fragrant, sprung beneath the foot, and the edges flicked with the white flakes of "May." On every side was heard the plaintive cuckoo note and the sky lark's song; and when the quiet of the evening had come, the less intrusive one of the nightingale. We have in America sweeter song birds than these, but none that interested me so much. Now, the gorse is gone, the birds have ceased to sing, and the flowers are withered. Much of the peculiar beauty of the country is gone.

I visited, while at Kiegate, an old church at Gomshall, a few miles from there. Some parts of it date 800 years back; but as it is at present, it is a queer medley of the original Norman and sham Gothic—the latter being the addition of the Church wardens from time to time. It is a double building, a heavy, octagonal spire resting on one of the roofs. The interior is very massive, the ceiling being supported by heavy stone columns and arches. There is a fine old stained window, and a number of monumental brasses, bronze effigies fastened to the tablets in the floor and on the wall, with a stone baptismal font several hundred years old; but not so good a substitute for the river Jordan as the mill-pond close by. The old pew-opener was lamenting that the wardens were about to remove the heavy carved oak wood work from the interior, and replace it with something new and cheap—plain deal pews, &c. The whole building is a singular specimen of the spirit of the age—a spirit which, recognizing no real utility in the hallowed associations of another time, and no value in beauty or grandeur save as they please the eye or amuse an idle hour, hesitates not to sacrifice them to a miserable economy or to its false and narrow notions of the useful. When men sceptically ask the use of the beautiful, do they consider why they were created? whether to live merely, or to add to the glory of God? Did He give to us the perception of and love for the beautiful only to amuse moments of relaxation, moments snatched from the spirit deadening cares of the world? So far as the ordinary acceptation of the useful is concerned, the sun might have risen and set without the gorgeous beauty we admire in it, and when the thirsty earth demanded refreshment a vail of cloud might have shed rain on it without any of the grandeur of a gathering storm; we might have had the grass for the cattle without the wild flowers springing in their gemmed beauty amidst it. That there is a use in all these things, is proved by the fact of God's having given them and the faculty to enjoy them; and he who can pass with untouched heart these his hand-marks, should stop and ask for faith in the power that clothed the lilly of the valley. The same utility exists in the aspirations of art, and thence comes the elevation of spirit to him who contemplates them in a pure mind; and the world lost when modern Puritanism vanished art from the sanctuary of God, in its zeal to correct the abuses which had been introduced by its means. Increased intelligence should have purified its abuses, not destroyed it and them together. To the Catholic, the church in which he worships—the shrine at which he kneels—are embodied sermons; all things around him are emblems of some received truth in Christian doctrine; and though we rejoice in greater light, it remains to be shown that there is in the Christian world at large a greater zeal to serve God. In the days when men like Solomon thought they glorified God by beautifying his temple, their treasures were poured out like water to do him honor in the way they deemed most acceptable. Now, when they have learned that they may worship God in any temple, they put their money into railroad stock, and how much is given to religion? They gave to the best of their knowledge; we, knowing better how to give, give comparatively nothing at all.

I visited the ruins of Betchworth Castle while at Kiegate. They are rather small, and not of great antiquity, but covered with ivy, and the young trees are growing up in the banqueting hall. We advanced through the vaulted passages and apartments in search of picturesque points, startling the wild birds from their quiet nooks, and waking the echoes by merry laughter and words of jest, shouted to each other through the long halls, and finally pitched our seats in the shadow of the south wall for an hour or two's drawing, and when we had wearied with that, we searched out the winding paths which led down the hill side and which were in some places so grown in with the shrubbery as to be hardly discoverable.

On my return to London, I found an American staying at my lodging house, and have occupied myself for a few days in showing him the sights. He is heartily sick of England, though he has been here but two weeks, and curses the ways of the country, traveling conveniences, &c., included. He growls at the cooking and way of living, and thinks he will see all he wants to in two weeks and then go to the Continent. If he staid longer he would like it better.

DR. CHALMERS DISCOURAGED.

The following anecdote is one of the most instructive that we remember to have seen. It shows at once how the greatest preachers are sometimes almost discouraged in view of the seeming failure of their best endeavors, and how, at the same time, they may be accomplishing great, though unseen results. We quote from an article on "Illustrations of Popularity," in the last London Baptist Magazine.

When he [Dr. Chalmers,] had been at Glasgow above two years, though his popularity was unbounded, his own spirits were greatly depressed. Having preached on one occasion at the Barony church for Dr. Burns, and dined with him and some other ministers and friends afterwards, a gentleman, who was present, writes, "I was exceedingly disappointed to see that Dr. Chalmers, who, in ordinary times, poured a fascinating influence over every company where he was, seemed extremely dull, nay, I may say dejected. When he arose, about nine o'clock, to go away, as our tract homeward lay for some distance in the same direction, I left the company along with him. When we had got together, I said to the Doctor,

"Are you well enough to-day, Doctor? for I have noticed you have not to-day been in your usual trim."

"Oh, yes," he said, "I am quite in good health, but I am not comfortable. I am grieved in my mind."

Seeing that he so frankly communicated to me the general cause of his unusual appearance, I used the freedom to say,

"Well, Doctor, is this a matter that I may be made acquainted with, as, if it is not, I have no wish to pry into any thing of a private nature?"

"Oh, yes," he replied, "you may perfectly know it, for it is a matter that presses very grieviously upon me. In short, the truth is," said he, in his own emphatic manner, "I have mistaken the way of my duty to God in at all coming to your city. I am doing no good. God has not blessed and is not blessing my ministry here."

On hearing this I replied, "Well, Doctor, it is a very remarkable circumstance that, in the providence of God, you should have been sent with your complaint to me on this point, because I have it in my power at any rate to mention one instance in which your ministry has been made instrumental in bringing a soul from darkness to the marvelous light of the gospel of salvation."

"Can you?" said he, "then you will give me the best news I have heard since I came among you.' I then narrated to him the following particulars:

At the time this took place, I was an elder under the late venerated Dr. Balfour, minister of the Outer High Church, whose practice it was, when he read over the names of those who were applying for admission to the ordinance of the Lord's Supper, to give us so much of their history and experience as he had been, in conversation with them, able to discover, and to request that some of the elders might, as far as possible, scrutinize further, and communicate to him the result. I well remember, at the sacrament, which in the town churches is always solemnized in the month of April, he mentioned the name of a young man who had applied to be a communicant. After he had read over his name—"By the bye," said the good servant of the Lord, "I must tell you something about this young man, for his history is somewhat interesting and singular. He sat, said Dr. Balfour, "for nearly twenty years under my ministry, but did not appear to derive any good from it; but when my worthy friend, Dr. Chalmers, (for that was the almost uniform designation he gave him when he had occasion to speak of him,) came to Glasgow, he was attracted to him by his splendid talents, and sat under his ministry for about two years, and then it pleased the Lord to come to him in the day of his power; and I have every reason to think him a truly converted young man. And now that he wishes to become a member of the church, he wishes to return to us. But," added Dr. Balfour, with a truly sublime humility, "it was not under my ministry that he was turned to the Lord, though he sat for the greater part of his lifetime in the Outer Church; but it was under the preaching of Dr. Chalmers."

You know what was Dr. Chalmers' ardent manner when any thing that related to the glory of Christ's kingdom, or to the spiritual good of his fellow-creatures, was made known to him; and you may easily conceive with what exuberant joy he heard this simple annal of the good done through his pastoral superintendence.

"Ah," said he, "Mr. Wright, what blessed, what comforting news you give me. I knew it not; but it strengthens me; for really, I was beginning to fail from an apprehension that I had not been acting according to the will of God in coming to your city."

REMINISCENCES OF CHILDHOOD.

"Thought's golden key Unlocks the treasure-house of memory."

The affectionate son and biographer of Crabbe, the poet, writing of this gifted parent, says—"Among my first recollections of him is his carrying me up to his private room to prayers in the summer evenings, about sunset, and rewarding my silence and attention, afterwards, with a view of the flower garden through his prism." Earlier still were his reminiscences of his mother. "The very earliest, I think," he continues, "is of her combing my hair one evening, by the light of the fire, which hardly broke the long shadows of the room, and singing the plaintive air of 'Kitty Fell,' till, though I could not have been more than two or three years old, my tears dropped profusely." How natural and touching are such remembrances—and who has not some?

The late Thomas Hood has written a little poem upon this subject, full of a sad truth, tenderly and beautifully expressed, which want of space alone prevents us from quoting entire.

"I remember, I remember
The house where I was born,
The little window where the sun
Came peeping in at morn;
It never came a wink too soon,
Nor brought too long a day;
But now I often wish the night
Had borne my breath away!

I remember, I remember,
The fir trees, dark and high;
I used to think their slender spires
Were close against the sky;
It was a childish ignorance,
But now 'tis little joy
To know I'm further off from heaven
Than when I was a boy!"

Dickens says—"I recollect when I was a very young child, having a fancy that the reflection of the moon in water was a path to heaven, trodden by the spirits of good people on their way to God."

One of our first living poets, speaking of the strange idiosyncracies of childhood, told us that he used to take a great and painful delight in looking at a star—or rather, its reflection in the waters of a certain moat belonging to Fort George, in Invernesshire, not far from his father's parsonage. He used to watch it with a species of fascination, mingled with fear, until it grew a passion. He recollects once trying to hit it with a stone, and running away frightened to see it, when the rippling of the water had subsided, shining down bright and calm as ever. "My great secret-keeper, my dear mother," he adds, "chided me gently for striking what I loved—but it was not love I felt for that star."

The same poet, when very young, had the brain fever, during which he kept pleading in his intense thirst, for a draught of the water which Moses struck from the rock of Horeb, with the rod of miracles; and parched and burning as he was, would touch nothing else. He was given over; when that same dear mother of whom affectionate mention has before been made, suddenly thought of substituting common spring water, for the miraculous draught, which she brought to his bedside carefully corked and sealed up. The child drank the healing waters—fell into a sweet sleep—and recovered.

A lady whose early years were passed in an old country house in the North of England, remembers, that when a very little child she always used to repeat the following lines; but she cannot recollect who taught them to her. Most probably the faithful and simple-hearted old nurse, who died when the narrator was about three or four years old, at the advanced age of ninety-eight, the greater part of which had been spent in the service of the family. The words are rude enough, although not without a certain charm—

"There are four corners to my bed,
There are four angels there laid spread—
One to read, one to write,
And two to guard me all the night;
And if I die before I wake,
I pray to Christ, my soul to take."

The relator of this little anecdote has a distinct recollection of her ancient bed-chamber, with its tapestried walls, and deep windows, and how the curtains used to sway backwards and forwards when the wind was high; while that same wind sang all sorts of wild and mournful tunes in the wide, open chimney, or played with the old trees without, until they creaked again! And yet the child never felt frightened, but used to think that no harm could possibly come with the four angels watching over her! She even fancied she could distinguish them apart. Two had large books open before them, in which one occasionally wrote; while the others kept guard over her all through the long night. She remembers being much struck, while walking with her nurse through the village churchyard, by some figures upon an ancient grave stone, which reminded her of the angels, but, on approaching nearer, she found them cold and decayed, and not near so beautiful. And that she wept bitterly, fancying they must be dead.

"Years afterwards," writes the narrator, "I returned, a grey-headed old woman, to the home of my childhood. I even slept in the same room, and heard the wind singing the same wild tunes, and rushing and moaning through the house like an unquiet spirit. I had grown wiser since then, but not less happy. Although the angels had vanished, I could still repeat the concluding lines of my little prayer with child-like faith, and my sleep was sweet and peaceful."

THE SELF-FREED.

BY WILLIAM OLAND BOURNE.

"No person held to service or labor in one State, under the laws thereof, escaping into another, shall in consequence of any laws or regulations therein, be discharged from such service or labor, but SHALL BE DELIVERED UP on claim of the party to whom such service or labor is due."

[Constitution of the United States, Art. III. Sec. 2.

"THOU SHALT NOT DELIVER unto his master the servant who is escaped from his master unto thee; he shall dwell with thee, even among you in that place where he shall choose, in one of thy gates, where it liketh him best; thou shalt not oppress him. [Deut. xxiii. 15, 16.

I SAT at my door on an eve in Spring,
When the day with its toil was oe'r,
And I listened and heard my children sing
The hymn I had often sung before;
The full round moon was just lighting the sky,
As it rose on the distant hill,
And the stars looked down with a placid eye
On the hamlet whose inmates were still.

The hymn had died out on the whispering breeze,
And lost was the sweet, tuneful sound,
While the shadows that fell from the tall poplar trees
Were stretching along on the ground:
When there stopped at the gate a man weary and worn,
Who leaned on the wicket and spoke,
As he asked for a place where to sleep till the morn—
He would go ere the neighbors awoke.

He took off his hat and he heaved a sigh,
And he asked for some bread to eat,
And my bosom swelled up, I could scarcely tell why,
For my heart with its sympathy beat;
I bade him walk in—I would hear his tale—
He should eat and stay there for the night—
So he left his old staff leaning by on a rail,
And a bundle just pushed out of sight.

He held his torn hat in his hand on his knee,
And he seemed very fearful at first,
But he saw of a friend he was certain in me,
And he told me his tale, e'en the worst;
He said—"I have come from the Land of the Slave—
Where the waters of Ocmulgee rolled—
And I'd rather lie down even now in my grave,
Than go back to the South to be sold."

With a prayer in his gaze, and a tremulous voice,
He begged me to help him along—
And I told him to cheer, in his soul to rejoice,
For I hated the Curse and the Wrong;
I would show him the way and send him to friends
Who would help him for Freedom to fly,
Where the free air floats and the free soul bends
To the Author of Freedom on high.

My heart welled up with a holy joy,
As I looked at my toil worn guest,
And I bade my darling girl and boy
Sing a hymn ere they went to rest;
And they went and took of their little store,
And out of their heart they gave,
And we thanked our God that we had still more
In love for the flying slave.

'Tis the Law of God in the human soul—
'Tis the Law in the Word Divine—
It shall live while the earth in its course shall roll,
IT SHALL LIVE IN THIS SOUL OF MINE!
Let the law of the land forge its bond of wrong!
I will help when the self-freed crave!
For the law in my soul, bright beaming and strong,
Bids me succor the flying slave!

STRIKING RETRIBUTION.

The massacre of Protestants in France, at the Revocation of the edict of Nantes, and by order of the French King, has been followed by a remarkable experience of the whole line of French Kings. The facts of the case have been reduced to a nut-shell in the following, from the Edinburgh Witness:—

When the darkest of its many dark tragedies was enacted—the St. Bartholomew massacre—Knox was still alive. "Being conveyed to the pulpit," says McCrie, "and summoning up the remainder of his strength, he thundered the vengeance of heaven against 'that cruel murderer and false traitor, the King of France,' and desired Le Croc, the French Ambassador, to tell his master, that sentence was pronounced against him in Scotland, that the divine vengeance would never depart from him, nor from his house; if repentance did not ensue; but his name would remain an execration to posterity, and none proceeding from his loins should enjoy his kingdom in peace." Have the kings of France since that day reigned in peace, or descended from the throne full of years and honors? Charles IX., by whom the dreadful tragedy was enacted, died soon after in awful horrors, the blood flowing from every pore of his body. Henry III, his successor, fell by the hand of an assassin. Henry IV., after a reign of twenty years distracted by civil wars, died by the dagger of Ravilliac His successor, Louis XIII., after a reign of thirty-three years, spent mostly in warring with his subjects, died in his bed. Of Louis XIV., it is impossible to say whether the opening of his career was the more brilliant, or its close the more disastrous and unhappy. The reign of Louis XV. was marked by private profligacy, public profusion, increasing financial embarrassment, growing discontent. The king expired of a mortal distemper caught in the pursuit of his pleasures. In the next reign the Revolution appeared upon the scene, and Louis XVI. perished on the scaffold. The troubled lives and unhonored ends of the French kings since that period are too well known to require that we should dwell upon them. And now the death of Louis Phillippe adds another to the list of discrowned heads which have gone down in exile into the tomb.

REPEATED STROKES.

Under this heading, the Congregationalist has some touching remarks occasioned by late visitations of mortality within its circle of readers. Speaking of afflictions coming in quick and impressive succession, that paper says:—

We have seldom met with a more striking instance of this than the repeated deaths which have recently occurred in the family of the late Rev. Mr. Bullard, of Barre, whose death was briefly noticed a few weeks since, in our columns. First the husband and father was stricken, and after an illness of twelve days, departed to his rest. A week or two elapsed, and the angel came again to that sad and desolate dwelling. The youngest and purest of those little ones now bereft of a father's care and love, was taken. The touch of an icy hand was on him, and he withered and faded from the earth. Four days of illness and he died, and then the father's grave was opened and the little form that was wont to spring so joyously into his arms, sought again its resting-place, and the little head that often reclining on that bosom forgot its sorrows, was laid yet again thereon in deep and dreamless slumber. Death marred not the stainless beauty of that cherub form, and while yet the loveliness of life was fresh upon him, they made for him a pillow of flowers and laid him down to his last sleep.

"No bitter tears for thee be shed,
Blossom of being seen and gone;
With flowers alone we strew thy bed,
O blest departed one;
Whose all of life—a rosy ray,
Blushed into dawn and passed away."

While the widowed and sorely stricken mother was watching the last moments of her departing boy, other friends in another apartment of the same dwelling, were standing by the death-bed of the aged grand-parent, who, sustained by the same faith that had cheered and strengthened the son, fell asleep in Jesus and was at rest.

Thus in the space of three weeks were called away the grandsire of seventy, the father in the prime of life, and the infant of days; representatives of three generations to learn together the notes of that new song which the redeemed sing in heaven.

THE BLIND PARROT.

Thomas Campbell, the poet, related the following as the origin of his fine poem, the Parrot:—

"Many long years ago, while I was sealed up in the Hebrides, I became intimate with a family who had a beautiful parrot, which a young mariner had brought from South America as a present to his sweetheart. This happened long before my arrival at the Mull; the Poll for many years had been a much-prized and petted favorite in the household. He was a captive, to be sure, but allowed at times to be outside his cage on parole; and always observing good faith and gratitude for such indulgences, they were repeated as often as appeared consistent with safe custody. The few words Gaelic which he had picked up in his voyage to the north, were just sufficient, on his arrival, to bespeak the good-will of the family, and recommend himself to their hospitality; but his vocabulary was soon increased—he became a great mimic—he could imitate the cries of every domestic animal—the voices of the servants—he could laugh, whistle, and scold, like any other biped around him. He was, in short, a match even for Kelly's renowned parrot; for though he could not, or would not, sing 'God save the King,' he was a proficient in 'Charlie is my darling,' and other Jacobite airs, with which he never failed to regale the company, when properly introduced.

"Poll was indeed a remarkable specimen of his tribe, and the daily wonder of the neighborhood. Years flew by; and although kind treatment had quite reconciled him to his cage, it could not ward off the usual effects of old age, particularly in a climate where the sun rarely penetrated within the bars of his prison. When I first saw him, his memory had greatly failed him; while his bright green plumage was fast verging into a silvery grey. He had but little left of that triumphant chuckle which used to provoke such laughter among the youngsters; and day after day he would sit mute and moping on his perch, seldom answering the numerous questions that were put to him regarding the cause of his malady. Had any child of the family been sick, it could hardly have been treated with greater tenderness than Poll.

"At last, one morning just as the vernal equinox had blown a few ships into harbor, a stranger was announced and immediately recognized by the master of the house as a 'Don' something—a Spanish merchant, whose kindness to a young member of the family had been often mentioned in his letters from Mexico. One of his own ships, a brig, in which he had made the voyage, was then in the bay, driven in by stress of weather, for Mull was no market for Spanish goods. But that was not my business; he would pay a visit to Greenock, where in the present day at least, Spanish cargoes are rife enough.

"No sooner had their visitor exchanged salutations with the master of the house and his family, than the parrot caught his eye; and going up to the cage, he addressed the aged bird in familiar Spanish. The effect was electric; the poor blind captive seemed as if suddenly awakened to a new existence; he fluttered his wings in ecstasy—opened his eyes, fixed them, dim and sightless as they were, intently on the stranger; then answered him in the same speech—not an accent of which he had ever heard for twenty years. His joy was excessive—but it was very short; for in the midst of his screams and antics, poor Poll dropped dead from his perch."

Such was the incident upon which Campbell composed the little ballad entitled "The Parrot." It had taken strong hold of his memory, and, after the lapse of forty years, found its way into the into the pages of the "New Monthly," and is now incorporated with his acknowledged Poems. The following is an extract:—

"The deep affections of the breast,
That Heaven to living things imparts,
Are not exclusively possess'd
By human hearts.

A parrot from the Spanish Main,
Full young, and early caged, came o'er,
With bright wings to the bleak domain
Of Mulla's shore.

But, petted in our climate cold,
He lived, and chatter'd many a day;
Until with age, from green and gold,
His wings grew grey.

* * * * * *

At last, when blind and seeming dumb,
He scolded, laugh'd, and spoke no more,
A Spanish stranger chanced to come
To Mulla's shore;

He hail'd the bird in Spanish speech;
The bird in Spanish speech replied,
Flapp'd round his cage, with joyous screech,— Dropt down, and died!"

CONVERTS FROM MOHAMMEDANISM.

The following, is narrated in a letter of Rev. J. De Kock, an English missionary in South Africa. We quote from the Evangelical Magazine:—

Herewith I beg to send you a brief account of the conversion of a Mohammedan female. Elizabeth Dolley, the subject of the present Memoir, was born at Uitenhage, of heathen parents, and at an early age, was married to a Mohammedan, whose first care after marriage, was to induce her to embrace his faith, in which he succeeded. Thus they lived together, for a period of twenty years, in total spiritual darkness, in the midst of professing Christians, never visiting a place of Christian worship, till a short time after the commencement of my labors here, when she was prevailed upon by her friends to go and hear, "the new preacher," as they called me, when it pleased our God, through his tender mercy, to open her heart to what was spoken. She became seriously concerned about her condition, and said to her friends, that, though she could hardly remember anything of the sermon, yet she felt it had a strange effect upon her: she became convinced of the magnitude of her sins, and that, were she then to die, she was certain she must go to hell. She then became a regular attendant on my ministry; but her husband observing her troubled and sorrowful, and becoming too serious for his taste, forbade her to attend chapel any longer.

She, however, declared it impossible for her to please him in this instance, for that the chapel had become the place her soul panted after; whereupon he menaced her, and said he would betake himself to drinking. Then her sufferings commenced; he would wait for her at the chapel door, beat her till she reached home, sell her things to get drink, and ceased to work at his trade; in short, she was at length obliged to place herself under the protection of the magistrate. After some time, it pleased the Lord to bring him near his grave. During his illness, he was touched by her unwearied attendance on him, though he had been so unkind to her. One morning, he burst into tears, and asked if she thought I would come, were he to send for me. She said, most gladly, she was convinced. I was sent for. When I came, I found him as meek and gentle as a child. He asked me to forgive him, and whether I thought God could forgive him as readily as his wife had done. I assured him, if he would but flee for refuge to lay hold upon the hope set before us in the Gospel, he would find it impossible for God to lie. His sickness proved not unto death, but for the glory of God. He is now, I hope, making good progress, and I purpose, as soon as I see my way clear, to admit him to membership. The wife was baptized on the 23d of December last, with two others, and promises to become an ornament to the church of Christ.

WORKING CHRISTIANS.

Learn to be working Christians. "Be ye doers of the Word, and not hearers only, deceiving your own souls." It is very striking to see the usefulness of many Christians. Are there none of you who know what it is to be selfish in your Christianity? You have seen a selfish child go into some secret place to enjoy some delicious morsel undisturbed by his companions? So it is with some Christians. They feed upon Christ and forgiveness; but it is alone, and all for themselves. Are there not some of you who can enjoy being a Christian, while your dearest friend is not; and yet you will not speak of Him? See, here you have got work to do. When Christ found you, he said, "Go, work in my vineyard." What were you hired for, if it was not to spread salvation? What blessed for? Oh, my Christian friends! how little you live as if you were the servants of Christ! How much idle time and idle talk you have! This is not like a good servant. How many things you have to do for yourself! how few for Christ and his people! This is not like a servant. [M'Cheyne.

THE APPROACHING FAST-DAY.

We hope that our churches will not forget the day of fasting and prayer appointed by the Missionary Society, at its late Annual Meeting, to be held on the third day of next month. The object contemplated, is to implore the blessing of God upon our missionary operations, both in this and in foreign lands. As a denomination, we have declared our intention of publishing the gospel wherever a door may be opened for us, God giving us the means; but, after all, we must not forget that our planting and watering will be followed by increase, just in proportion as the Holy Spirit attends our labors. We take the liberty of offering a few hints in reference to the contemplated season of prayer.

1. That it should be a day rigidly devoted to the purpose for which it is set apart. In one respect it ought to be as much like a Sabbath day as possible; that is, the common every day business of life should be suspended, and the time spent in a religious manner till the going down of the sun. Make your calculations, brethren, to have no work done on that day. But in addition to this, remember that it is a fast-day. Let no food be eaten; or, if age or bodily infirmity in some cases renders it unadvisable to abstain altogether, let it be taken very sparingly, and that of the plainest kind. A devoted Christian, however, needs no instruction as to the right manner of keeping a fast.

2. That some preparation may be necessary. We suggest, that as the day previous will be the first Sabbath in the month, and consequently the time of the monthly concert, if the brethren will make larger contributions that day than usual, they will most probably offer their prayers on fast-day with more earnestness, and without being troubled with a consciousness of their own insincerity. On the other hand, if they contribute in a niggardly manner, and then are heard, the next day, to ask God to bless the missionary cause, it will look very much as if they were somewhat hypocritical in their professions. We never hear a covetous, miserly disciple pouring forth his prayers for the blessing of God upon efforts to propagate the gospel, without feeling in our hearts, that that man is telling the Almighty a plain up-and-down lie. But enough said on this point; though we would just like to add, that if there is any one who has the ability to give fifty dollars to the Shanghai Chapel, and has hitherto refused to do it, the fast-day will do him much more good, if he will first count out the money, and religiously dedicate it to that object.

3. That there are some particular points, which call for special earnestness in our prayers. One thing that we ought to pray for with great earnestness, is that there may be raised up a more abundant supply of missionaries. "The harvest is great, but the laborers are few. Pray ye, therefore, the Lord of the harvest, that he will send forth laborers into his harvest." Brethren Carpenter and Wardner have been gone from us nearly four years, yet up to this time no one has been found ready to go to their aid. Only two laborers of our denomination, and their wives, in the vast empire of China! Not only so, but other countries are open to our efforts, and we have no missionaries to send. God is able to raise up faithful men, but he waits for our prayers. Another thing calling for our fervent supplications, is that those heathen to whom our missionaries have been the messengers of life, may have grace given them to own Christ before men, and continue steadfast in the faith. Brother Wardner's teacher, though he has given good evidence of being a renewed man, had not, at the last accounts, been baptized. By one device, or another, the enemy had succeeded in holding him back from this duty. Two females also, members of the family of brother Carpenter's late teacher, had embraced the faith; but such is the peculiarity of Chinese society, that mighty obstacles must be overcome in order to their following Christ in the ordinances of his house. Especially is this the case with Ne-May, who, besides being hampered with all the usual difficulties which stand in the way of females in that devil-ridden country, is betrothed to an idolater. None but God can break the shackles, and set her completely at liberty. Our prayers are specially requested in her behalf. It would be well, also, to remember the peculiarly trying situation of our missionaries themselves. They are Sabbath-keepers, and, as such, bound to protest against the promulgation of that tradition which makes void the divine law. This brings them, to a certain extent, into conflict with their fellow missionaries of other orders. There is no help for this, so long as the error of Sunday-keeping exists. Let us make it our most fervent prayer, that God will enable them to conduct themselves, in this matter, wisely. Let us make it our prayer, too, that God will open the eyes of our brethren in error, that they may see and yield obedience to the claims of his law.

It will be remembered, that a resolution was passed at our Anniversary, requesting that the Annual Report of the Boatd be read publicly to the different churches. The approaching fast-day will be a very suitable time for attending to that duty; and as the Report is now nearly through the press, we shall make an effort to send at least one copy to every church immediately. May God pour upon us the spirit of grace and of supplication, and revive the missionary work among us.

A MISSION TO CANADA.

The Corresponding Secretary of the Missionary Society deems it proper to give notice, that the Board has under contemplation the establishment of a mission in some part of Lower Canada; the object being to bring the truth of the gospel to bear upon the French population of that country, and upon such others as may, in the providence of God, be accessible.

It is proposed to send, as a pioneer in this work, our brother Wm. M. Jones, recently returned from Hayti, where he has been laboring under the patronage of the Baptist Free Mission Society. Brother J. has acquired a good knowledge of the French language, can speak and write it with ease, and is, in other respects, judged to be well qualified for the undertaking. He will spend the approaching winter in the United States, occupying a part of his time in translating some of our tracts into the French, and, as early in the spring as the season will permit, will take his leave for Canada, furnished with a good supply of tracts and other religious works, acting somewhat in the capacity of colporteur, till, having explored the country, he shall find the most suitable place for locating the mission.

It is known that the population of Lower Canada (or, as it is now called, Canada East) is almost wholly under the spiritual dominion of Rome. To do something toward showing them the way of life, is the duty of those who have received mercy of the Lord to be faithful; and, however unpromising the prospect may be in the judgment of some, we think that a review of what has been done for Roman Catholics by other orders, not only in Canada, but in Ireland, in France, in Germany, and in other places, will result in the conviction that they are not utterly inaccessible. Our First-day Baptist brethren have a very promising mission at Grand Ligne, to say nothing of other establishments. But it is our firm persuasion, that Sabbath-keepers, above all others, are called to the work of preaching the gospel to the adherents of Rome. Those who yet linger in her gates, cannot labor for their salvation so effectually as those who have come quite out. In the matter of the Sabbath, at all events, we suppose ourselves to be free from the sin of symbolizing with her; and if in any thing else we are polluted with her abominations, may God reveal even this to us. If we enter upon the work, and prosecute it faithfully and in humble reliance on the Holy Spirit, we shall be accepted, and many of those whom God designs to bring out of her, that they be not partakers of her plagues, may be brought out by our instrumentality.

The intercourse between Canada and the States is every day becoming more extensive, and should the much-talked-of "annexation" ever take place, the importance of having its population thoroughly imbued with Protestant principles will be manifest. It is hoped that our own denomination will awaken to the work of spreading these principles in consistency with its well-known motto, "The Bible our only guide in matters of faith and practice."

Should the mission go into operation, there will be a call for enlarged contributions to our treasury. This enlargement ought to be made at once; for it is evident that considerable must be done in the way of preparation; besides that, the Board wish to know to what extent the denomination will justify them in their wish to carry forward a vigorous enterprise in that country. Perhaps some one, or more, may be found willing to accompany Bro. Jones; and if so, the Board would wish the state of the funds to be such as will fully warrant them in accepting such well qualified candidates as may offer for the purpose. Will the pastors and leading brethren in our churches take this matter in hand, and exert themselves to bring about liberal contributions and prompt remittances? THOS. B. BROWN, Cor. Sec.

EXTRACT FROM A MISSIONARY'S LETTER.

The following extract from a letter recently received, though not so late as matter already published, is interesting as showing the kind of labor in which our missionaries are engaged, and the spirit with which they prosecute it.

SHANGHAI, March 24.

Yesterday we wrote you a hasty letter by "overland," in the midst of our more sober efforts to get up a quantity of matter to go by ship. Scarcely had we found a breathing time, when a neighbor of ours called for me, by previous appointment, to go with her and visit some of her country-people whom I had not yet seen. They had sent the invitation through her, and most gladly did I accept of it. We found the owner of the house a maiden lady of fifty-five, and the wife of her tenant the occupant; and I had no need to be told that they were of a superior rank, as well as of superior intelligence. From the first, I was treated with that easy hospitality which makes one feel at home even among idolaters. Much information was given and exchanged on various subjects; among others, the object of our mission here was explained, at their voluntary request, the new doctrine discussed, the true God inquired after, and the character and offices of the blessed Saviour made a suject of thoughtful discussion. Never have I seen people of their standing seem equally interested in us and our mission. Of course no personal interest was manifest, although I think they easily comprehended the inefficiency which we attach to personal merit, and the need of relying upon the Son of God for salvation. They have promised to visit us, and to come to the chapel to attend our services. This is often done, by those who do not mean to attend, but there is one comfort—a spirit of inquiry is evidently awake, and this is the ground of our rejoicing. It is truly gratifying to know that we are not utterly despised, even by these poor heathen, and we can but hope that our social interviews will act as a gentle cord to bind them to us, and open their ears, perhaps also their hearts, to listen to the truth. O how much do we need faith! I sometimes wonder that any blessing can be bestowed upon those who are so destitute of that great, that powerful grace—that weapon by which so much is to be accomplished, without which every thing is dead. You can hardly realize how spirit-stirring to us are the reports of proceedings by our brethren at home, by the churches, and the societies. What have we to fear, while those who thus uphold us, who thus sustain us, are so active, so energetic? The Lord reward them, as also we are sure he does, by blessings on their own heads, their bounties, and their prayers. L. M. C.

BRITISH CORRESPONDENCE—No. 16.

GLASGOW, Oct. 4th, 1850.

Our deteriorated condition in respect to Education, has for a considerable number of years engaged attention. Mere education does not form a substitute for religion, nor give security for the morals of its possessor; for we see flagrant instances of deep criminality among those for whom schools had done much; and even science, in the present day, is used as the hand-maid of villainy. Education is, however, a valuable auxiliary to religion; and wherever, and whenever a deep interest in divine truth has appeared, it has always been ready to call to its aid the means of instruction. Imperfect as all reformations in this land have been, one distinguishing characteristic of such movements has ever been, largely to afford opportunities of advancement in intellectual culture. And for their attainments in this respect, certain classes in England, and the people of Scotland generally, long held distinguished place. The Universities of the one, and the Parish Schools of the other, were mainly instrumental in producing this result. Religion was in alliance with both; and although there have always been many deteriorating causes, yet evidence has been furnished of the good that might accrue from the church's employment of extensive agency of sanctified character for the instruction of her youth. In Scotland, the changes effected in the circumstances of our population impaired insensibly the efficiency of the Schools as adapted for their former condition. Adapted as these schools were for parishes, in which there were few towns of any magnitude, the growth of manufactures, by tending to the growth of large towns, has, for a hundred years back, been throwing multitudes into concentration, where there was no corresponding provision made by the State for the enlarged necessities which their education thus required. Some voluntary efforts were indeed made to supplement what Government provided; for parents who in the rural parish school had obtained the instruction they prized, were ready to contribute the means for their children obtaining similar advantages. Yet even this feeling gradually died out as a race arose who knew less than their fathers of the value of that which thus they neglected.

The progress of this evil has, however, for some time past been occasioning serious apprehension, and desire has been largely shown for its abatement and removal. In this cause the Free Church has honorably distinguished itself; although not without showing some of its highly sectarian character. No other of the large denominations have originated united or systematic efforts for the purpose; the duty is left to individual churches, and imperfectly performed. In last session of Parliament, Lord Melgrand introduced a Bill in the House of Commons to make more perfect provision for education in Scotland. He proposed to vest the immediate management in local Boards, partly elected and partly permanent members—the former chosen by the rate-payers where there there is an assessment for the relief of the poor, and by the heads of families where is none. There was to have been a Central Board, with paid Chairman and Secretary, in Edinburgh. There were to be no religious tests required of teachers, but certificates of qualification otherwise to be presented. The funds were to be raised by local assessment, supplemented by Government grants. A meeting of electors and heritors was to determine whether farther educational means were necessary for the district—the local Board having choice of the teachers and of the branches to be taught, subject to certain regulations and supervision. The Bill was lost on the second reading by a large majority. The dissentions of religious parties in the country was the cause of its failure—but for these, defects might probably have been amended. Provision was made for the established minister of the parish being ex-officio a member of the local Board of Direction, and for heritors voting by proxy. Both of these were also disliked—the first because it gave power to a class whom an increasing number of dissentors were desirous to exclude, and the second because it was feared that the votes of absentee heritors would be used by factors and others for purposes different from the educational improvement of the the district. One clause above alluded to, was obnoxious equally to the friends of the establishment and dissenters—that appointing a Central Board of control and direction in Edinburgh. The tendency to centralise power finds little favor in the provinces, and experience seems to indicate should not be resorted to in any case where local direction would serve. The parish, like the family, may well be regarded as the training school for higher departments of government; and where deficiency is perceived, the parties might be aided by advice rather than be supplanted.

A separate Bill for promoting education in England was introduced into the House of Commons by Mr. Fox, a Socinian preacher. It provided only for secular education also; and one of its promoters urged that it would provide education for 100,000 Roman Catholics who are at present wholly without education. The suspicion of what might be done against evangelical religion by the influence of Mr. Fox, probably contributed to the rejection of the Bill by a large majority. The question of what should be done for the advancement of Education, both in Scotland and England, will therefore probably again engage the attention of the Legislature in the ensuing session of Parliment.

But a more difficult part of this great question is its aspect in relation to Ireland, the source of much of the increasing neglect in the other countries. A strong hold of Popery, no encouragement to instruction has there been given by its priesthood. They have done nothing themselves and they have thrown obstructions in the way of those who would. Government with great difficulty succeeded in establishing a system of schools among them—the class books of which were compiled on principles designed to please. The selections from Scripture were submitted to their dignitaries and portions supposed to condemn them were excluded. More recently, Government, has erected Colleges in Ireland, which again excluded religious instruction from its departments; and although on that account, branded as "the godless colleges" by some of the leaders, opposition had seemed in a great measure overcome, and Professors chosen from among the Roman Catholics had accepted appointments and are now drawing salaries when a fierce denunciation against the whole has come from Rome. A meeting of their dignitaries in Synod was convened to receive the Pope's rescript, which has by a majority concurred in its censure. The conclave was secret; but a Pastoral letter, since issued, proclaims to their ignorant people the dangers to be apprehended to the faith of the flock, by allowing light to stream in any degree upon the cherished darkness. It is believed, however, that a large minority objected to the conclusion arrived at.

Curiously illustrative of this state of things among the Irish Roman Catholic priesthood is a circumstance related of Dr. Cullen, their recently appointed Primate. In 1848, in a periodical which he avowedly edited, the Copernican system of astronomy was repudiated. As if to maintain the infallibilty of the tribunal which condemned Galileo, the Dr. reviewed with marked approbation a book entitled Anticopernico, in which the author affirms that the sun is but six feet in diameter—that the earth is six times larger than all the heavenly bodies put together—and has no motion but on its own axis!!

There is a considerable change taking place in the Proprietory of Ireland; which may yet have some influence for good upon the people, although our hopes of effectual remedy for their superstition are slender. An Act of Parliament was passed affording facilities for the sale of estates encumbered with debt. The Encumbered Estates' Court commenced operations Oct. 17th, 1849, and from that period till August 1st, 1850, they had received 1085 petitions for sales—of which they had already sanctioned 997 involving estates rented at an aggregate of £655,470, burdened by debts amounting to £12,400,348. Of that 997, the Court had at the period named, 99 estates for £748,474, in 360 lots, of which sum, £400,000 had then been paid into court, and £240,000 of it paid to parties. In some cases the tenants have become the proprietors; in others, the encumbered proprietors themselves, at prices considered present value. But the ground of hope to which I have alluded is the fact that a number of Scotch and English are among the purchasers. It is possible that the priesthood may cause them to "rue their bargains."

There was much talk lately of a sea serpent on the Irish coast—which, however, by positive evidence of a hoax, has become too much of the character of those inventions for which a part of the American press has become notorious, and in which they seem to take pride. J. A. BEGG.

AGRICULTURAL COLLEGE.—At a recent meeting of the Executive Committee of the New York State Agricultural Society, held in Albany, Oct. 10, the following preamble and resolution were adopted:—

Whereas, The subject of Agricultural Education has attracted much attention among the farmers in this State, and the attention of the Legislature having been called to it by his Excellency, Gov. Fish; and Commissioners having been appointed, who have reported favorably to the establishment of an Agricultural School and Experimental Farm; and a Committee of the Legislature at its last session having reported a bill in accordance with the recommendation of his Excellency, the Governor, and the Commissioners—which, owing to the press of business, and the late period at which it was introduced, was not acted upon; the Executive Committee having received frequent applications in relation to the subject, therefore—

Resolved, That it be recommended to the county and town Agricultural Associations, and to the farmers and mechanics, and others interested in the establishment of this institution, to send up memorials to the next Legislature for the establishment of an Agricultural School and Experimental Farm.

THE FRUIT OF A WORD FITLY SPOKEN.

The following is extracted from a letter written by our beloved sister Carpenter to a brother in New York. It shows by what simple means faith may be developed in the mind of the child of God. We have wondered at the stong and enduring faith of our gifted missionaries in China; and with one accord have all who knew them ascribed the work to that "word of faith" which they preach. Long may that faith comfort them in the work to which God has called them:—

"Do you remember a remark you made to me? We were on our way to Rhode Island, and had stopped in the city of New York for the day. The wind had risen, and, never having 'been to sea,' I was afraid to go on the Sound. You rather playfully said, 'You need not be afraid; you will not die to-night; the Lord has not done with you yet; he has more work for you to do before he takes you away.' I cannot tell how often the remark sounded in my ears that night above the war of elements, for it was a boisterous night; nor can I say how like a shadow it has haunted me since. I should not say a shadow, for it was a word fitly spoken; and even more precious than apples of gold in pictures of silver, has it ever been to me. I have more than once since that time crossed the Sound; I have traversed more than half the circumference of the globe; I have known such perils by sea as made the stoutest hearts quail; I have seen the helm deserted, and the men lying listlessly about the cabin as if conscious that their work was done; but that word would cling to me still, 'The Lord has not done with you yet.' This, too, in the hour of sickness, the only severe sickness I have had since leaving home, was a whisper of faith to my soul, and it is still sounding in my ears. Oh, it is sweet to live to labor. Sometimes I hope I feel that even trials are good for me. I could tell you of many that have been blessed to me; but they are all written in the 'book of God's remembrance.' I would live still—I would live long; but I would not, 'I would not live always.'"

THE FUGITIVE SLAVE BILL.

[Extract from a Business Letter.]

Having concluded other business matters, I wish to utter a word of indignation at what is popularly termed the "Fugitive Slave Bill."

I loathe slavery in all its forms. The claim of man on his fellow, to make him a chattel, is a relic of the barbarous ages Every principle of God's law is at war with the whole system. If he ever "suffered" a people bearing his name to claim a fellow being as property, it was "because of the hardness of their hearts. But, from the beginning it was not so." The true light that now shines rigorously requires that we should render to all "that which is just and equal"—"doing to others as we would that they should do to us." But slavery, root and branch, is a system of unmingled robbery; robbing man not only of the fruit of his sweat and toil, but it robs him of himself, of all that makes him a man.

Hated and abominated as slavery should be, in the abstract and the concrete, by every enlightened man, "the Fugitive Slave Bill" assumes a shape and embodies a character of odiousness which makes it a stench in the nostrils of God and man. What freeman can call it a law, or give it any of the honors of law? It is not law. It cannot be law. Others may call it a law; but, God helping me, I never will. I despise it; yea, more, I contemn it. Shall the panting fugitive, seeking refuge from the prison-house where "the sum of all villainies has made his fetters strong"—shall he be turned away from my door by the order of reckless tyranny? Shall he be told to go back to his master, and seek shelter and bread at the hands of his spoilers? No; never! NEVER!

While God entrusts me with the care of one of his domicils, I will share it with the panting fugitive. My last loaf shall be divided between him and my children. The slave hunter that shall attempt to cross my threshold in the pursuit, shall find no passage except through my riven carcass. The insignia of office can receive no honor at my hands in such a God-forbidden pursuit. No honor is due to the legislator who should enact, or the executive who should ratify, or the marshall who should attempt to enforce such a bill.

While I would not incite to deeds of blood-shed, I would arouse the indignant rebuke of freemen upon such high-handed treason—treason upon the Constitution—treason upon the sacred feelings of humanity—treason upon right, and treason upon the "higher law," the law of God.

Let every man, who has a voice or a vote or a name, marshal that voice and vote and name, to demand of our law makers to unmake what they have made in this matter, and to wipe from our nation's escutcheon the foul blot of that unhallowed Bill.

Yours for an equal Humanity and a pure Christianity, J. R. IRISH.

FREE-WILL BAPTIST CONFERENCE.—The fourteenth General Conference of the Free-Will Baptist churches was held at Providence last week, says the Independent. Rev. Amos Sutton, the English General Baptist missionary, from Orissa, was received with great attention. Communications of importance were received their own missionary in Orissa, Mr. Cooley. Rev. Mr. Horn was received as a delegate from the "Church of God," a body nearly harmonizing with them in doctrine. Rev. J. Woodman and Eli Noyes, D.D., made report of their visit as delegates to England:

"Dr. Noyes animadverted on the drunkenness, profanity and obscenity exhibited on board of the British steamer on their way out; and also upon the shameful bigotry in not permitting any but the religious services of the Established Church on board of those steamers. He said he had intended to chastise the English and the General Baptists a little; but yesterday he became so thoroughly disgusted with our abominable Fugitive Slave Bill, that for very shame's sake he thought he should hold his peace."

A very important discussion arose on a resolution declaring it to be "contrary to Gospel order and the usages of Free-Will Baptists," for a church to withdraw from a quarterly meeting without asking a dismission.

THE BAPTISTS OF NEW YORK ON THE "FUGITIVE SLAVE BILL."

At the annual session of the New York State Baptist Convention, held at Brockport on the 9th and 10th of October, 1850, an Informal Meeting of delegates was called to give a suitable expression of their views and feelings with regard to the law recently passed by Congress for the reärrest of fugitives from labor. This meeting, composed of both clergymen and laymen to the number of some hundreds, was large and enthusiastic, and animated by one spirit as to its object. Rev. Gibbon Williams was called to the chair, and Rev. J. B. Olcott appointed secretary. A committee appointed to draft resolutions, made the following report, which was adopted without a single dissenting voice.

Your committee appointed to draft and present resolutions expressive of the sense of this meeting upon the recent law enacted by the United States Congress and approved by the President, commonly called the "Fugitive Slave Law," beg leave to present the following report:

Whereas, The said law is manifestly a receding step in the cause of human liberty and enlightened human legislation, inasmuch as it deprives the colored inhabitants of the Free States of the two great bulwarks of personal safety, the benefit of the "Habeas Corpus Act," and the "Right of Trial by Jury," and whereas it lays the citizens of said States under legal obligations to assist the slaveholder and the slave huntar, in a business in which their moral sense and their best sympathies revolt with instinctive and unutterable aversion; and whereas the said law is oppressive in its bearing and disastrous in its results to multitudes of those whom we have learned to respect and love as American citizens and christians, whose only crime is that they have availed themselves of the opportunity which the Providence of God has opened to them of appropriating and enjoying that boon which of all, we most highly prize, and which is as much their birthright as our own, therefore

Resolved, That, as free citizens of the United States, and as lovers of equal rights, we repudiate the said law as contrary to the spirit of our glorious Declaration of Independance, and as opposed to the direct grants of the Constitution to every citizen, and to the law of God.

Resolved, That we will not voluntary aid, by any means whatever to giving effectiveness to this unjust and oppressive act of legislation.

Resolved, That in all suitable ways we will labor to secure a speedy repeal of the said "Fugitive Slave Law," and that until such repeal shall have been effected, we will in all suitable ways, express our sympathies with its oppressed subjects.

GIBSON WILLIAMS, Chairman.
J. B. OLCOTT, Secretary.

EPISCOPAL BOARD OF MISSIONS.—The reports made to this body at its late session in Cincinnati exhibit the receipts during the past three years to be $116,259 for foreign missions, and $201,128 for both foreign and domestic missions. The expenditures in that time were $205,787; $117,138 for foreign and $89,547 for domestic missions.

A colporteur in Missouri speaks of the popularity of Nelson's Cause and Cure of Infidelity, and of the fact that professional men seek it eagerly, and have been greatly benefited by it. And he cites three several instances of such individuals, as one consequence of reading the book, having procured each a copy of Scott's Family Bible.

One of the greatest telegraphic feats was accomplished last week. The European news received by the steamship Atlantic, reached New-Orleans over the Southern Morse line at 11¾ o'clock, having left Washington City at 12¼, beating time 30 minutes. The news was published in the Picayune simultaneously with all the Northern afternoon papers.

A letter from Burlington, Vt., states that L. G. Chittenden's room at the American Hotel, was broken into on Wednesday night, and a wallet containing $1,100 in cash and some notes of hand taken therefrom. There were eight bills of $100, each, on the Commercial Bank, balance Vermont money. A gold penknife marked "D. B. B." was also carried away.

European News.

The steamship America with one week later news from all parts of Europe, arrived at Boston Oct. 18. Early on the first morning out of Liverpool she ran down a coasting vessel between Wales and Waterford. The crew were saved.

There is a great stir in England in regard to Ocean Steam Navigation and Electric Telegraphs.

A new invention by a Mr. Jordon of Liverpool, by which he proposes to substitue iron for the wooden framing of vessels, is attracting a good deal of attention in that town. The inventor has taken out an American patent.

It is stated that the British Government has in contemplation the construction of a powerful squadron of steamers for the African coast, with the view of employing them to carry a monthly mail, and to act upon the slave prevention service. It is proposed that the fleet shall consist of forty vessels, and that one shall be detached from the station along the coast monthly to come home and return with the mails, thus establishing a regular monthly communication with the African coast, and effectually crushing the slave traffic.

Dispatches have been received in England from Sir John Ross, stating that on the 13th of August, three Esquimaux were found on the ice of Cape York, and on being questioned, they stated that in the winter of 1846 two ships were broken by the ice in the direction of Cape Dudley Diggl, and afterward burned by a fierce tribe of natives; that the ships in question were not whalers, and that epaulets were worn by the men, that part of the crews were drowned; that the remainder were sometime in houses or tents, apart from the natives; that they had guns, but no balls, and that being in a weak and exhausted condition, they were subsequently killed by the natives with darts or arrows. The paper from which the above is copied says that there is good reason to believe that the whole story is a gross misconception, but what those reasons are is not stated. The American ships Advance and Reserve had penetrated as far as any squadron.

In Ireland the Tenant League are extending their organizations throughout every town and parish in the country. The movement is regarded by the Government with considerable apprehension. The subject of the Irish Colleges continues to give rise to angry discussion. The Catholic Bishops are making more strenuous efforts to establish a University of their own and with a fair probability of success.

In France, thirty individuals accused of belonging to a Society having for its object the restoration of the house of the Bourbons, have been declared guilty, and sentenced to six months imprisonment.

M. Lagrange, an apothecary at Paris, has invented a new and most destructive kind of bullet, which, on striking any object against which it may be directed, explodes with a detonation as loud as that of the gun from which it is fired, and produces a most destructive effect.

The war in the Duchies has been renewed and with considerable vigor, the Holsteiners having, thus far, the advantage, but without bringing about any very important result. On the 29th of Sept. the Holsteiners commenced offensive operations. Proceeding from Rendsburg, on both sides of the Eyder, they have attacked Tonnin, and the Danes have evacuated the place. At the last accounts the Holsteiners had surrounded and bombarded Frederickstadt. The whole of the neighboring country, by cutting off the dykes of the Eyder, has been thrown under water. It seems that the Holsteiners cannot push their advantage far, unless the Danes choose to engage in a general battle.

Several battalions of Hungarians in the Austrian army in Lombardy have revolted, and the revolt was only suppressed by force, accompanied with bloodshed.

The Hungarian refugees have received permission to quit the Turkish Territory, when the term of location is over. Kossuth, it is said, applied to remain in Constantinople. The Divan is undecided on this point.

The High Court of Appeal at Turin has condemned, by a majority of 13 to 1, the Archbishop, for abuses of his high powers as a functionary. The See is declared to be vacant, all his spiritual domains are seized and the Archbishop himself condemned to banishment. The Archbishop Camliazi in Sardinia, has been treated like his colleague at Turin, and both have shipped off to Civita Vecchia. The power of the Pope will not, it seems, shield these obnoxious personages, the precise nature of whose crimes is not stated. All parties concur in stating that they have proved themselves exceedingly obnoxious.

Wealth of the City of New York.—By a late report of the Supervisors, the assessed value of real and personal property in this city is set at 286 millions; the tax on which is $339,697. This property is all taxed to about 6,000 persons. The increase for the year is thirty millions, nearly 10 per cent. The rules of valuation are too arbitrary to admit of a reliable comparison between different States or towns, as to their actual value.

The value of the real and personal estate of the State of New York, according to the last report of the Comptroller, was $536,162,901; of which $193,018,076 was in the county of New York; $62,164,451 being personal estate in the county, and $129,926,625 in the whole State. The State tax of 1849 amounted to $278,843 10; of which $130,000, or nearly one half, was paid by the city.

A Liberal Offer.—The State of Maine offers a farm to any citizen of the United States on the most liberal conditions. A law has passed the Legislature giving any man a farm of from one to two hundred acres, as he may desire, at the nominal price of fifty cents an acre, payable in one, two and three years, in work on the highways, a kind of remuneratian of as great advantage to the purchaser as to the State. The farmer must, however, clear up a certain number of acres within a given time and erect a house for his residence, or in other words, he must go to work, improve his farm, and make it his home.

In the eastern part of Maine are thousands of acres of the best and most productive land in New-England, owned by the State, and offered to settlers on the above advantageous conditions. In Aroostook County, where much of the land is, great crops have been raised, and the operations of the lumbermen afford a good market. The climate is healthy, the soil easy of cultivation, and the means of cultivation and social advancement constantly increasing [Gazette.

Later from California.

The Crescent City left Chagres on the evening of the 8th inst., arrived off Kingston on the 10th, at 6 P. M., left for New York on the evening of the 11th, and arrived at the quarantine, Staten Island, on Friday morning; thus making the passage in six days and eight hours. The Crescent City left the steamship Philadelphia at Chagres.

The most important news by this arrival, is the failure of several mercantile and banking houses.

The Alta California says:—"We can safely say, that the shipments of gold from this country, during the month of August, exceed that of any other month since the discovery of the mines. The amount is almost incredibly large, verging on three millions of dollars. This sum has been regularly manifested, and is exclusive of the parcels carried through by private hands.

There arrived at San Francisco from the 1st of August to the 13th of September, by sea, 5,940 persons, of whom 57 were females. The departures by sea for the same time were 4,672, all males.

Dr. Robinson, the squatter, has been committed for trial, on a charge of murder. The others committed under arrest had not been examined.

The Mayor of Sacramento City, Mr. Bigelow, who was so severely wounded in the late riots, continues to improve in health, though he has been obliged to submit to amputation of an arm.

The Pacific News remarks in relation to the mining district generally:—"From the mining regions, although the accounts are conflicting, they are generally of an encouraging character. A larger amount of gold will be taken out this season than during any former one, but it will be divided among a much greater number of miners, with perhaps less per man than has marked the past. Large fortunes will not be so frequent, but an abundant yield will result from persevering labor. The quartz rock, particularly in the Mariposa mines, is yielding a rich return, with an encouraging prospect for a still greater abundance, when the machiners for crushing the quartz shall be in successful operation."

The Placer Times has tbe following from the Northern mines:—"We learn that on Nelson's Creek miners are averaging about a half an ounce per day. Men are hired at a rate of wages varying from $6 to $8. From the south branch of the north Fork of Feather river, we hear reports that the generality of workmen are making fair wages.

A letter from the Mokalume river, dated August 28, published in the Pacific News, says: "The miners are doing very well, and are well satisfied with the products of their labor. Some fine specimens have been taken from the bed of the river, lately.

From the Southern mines, the Stockton Times has favorable accounts, though the intelligence is mostly of individual success. We have no account of the general results of the washings.

The Pacific News notices the reception of a specimen of silver ore from the Southern mines. The lump weighed twelve grains, and on melting nothing was lost in weight. It was taken from the region of the Sonorian camp, where a party was engaged in digging a race.

The foreign miners' tax does not appear to succeed very well as a revenue measure. The Sacramento Transcript says:—"We learn that a collector of taxes from foreign miners of Yuba and Sutter counties has not been very successful on his tour. We have just seen the deputy collector from Yuba, and he speaks very discouragingly of the prospects of turning over much revenue into the state treasury. We are informed that Collector Richardson of Yuba county, intends resigning."

The difficulties with the Indians still continue serious, A letter in the Alta Californian, dated American Bar, Feather river, says:—"I have recently learned of a desperate battle that took place between the miners and the Indians several miles above. While eight of the company were out prospecting, they were suddenly attacked by a party of fifty or sixty of the natives, some of whom were armed with pistols which had been imprudently sold them by the whites. The little band stood their ground for three hours under a terribly hot sun, and in a most disadvantageous position, till at last the Indians, disheartened by their slain, retreated. Captain Sanger was mortally wounded, and three others severely; the former was from Massachusetts, and the latter from Maine. Lt. Johnson started the next day with the entire force, and completely broke up all the enemy's villages or camps, and entirely routed them.

Improvements in San Francisco are now going forward with greater rapidity than ever. The "burnt district" is completely covered with buildings, many of them being two, three and four story brick blocks that would not disgrace a city of half a century's growth in the older States. The streets are being graded, planked and drained, and other desirable preparations made for the the rainy season, which is near at hand.

The rates of steamboat fare on the Sacramento have been materially reduced. Last winter, it cost a man $25 to $35 to get to Sacramento, but now $10 each way will cover the whole cost of the trip.

The Cholera was fearfully prevailing at Acapulco, and some 75 or 100 persons have lately died with it, principally natives.

At the request of the Central Authority at Washington, the Governor of New Jersey has appointed a local Committee, to select from the articles submitted, those most suitable for exhibition in the "World's Fair," to be held in London in May next.

Yucatan.—The following news from Yucatan and Guatemala is from the Watchman:

From recent intelligence it would appear that the belligerent parties in Yucatan, instead of ceasing, have recommenced hostilities with the utmost rigor. The Indians in the interior have again attacked the Spaniards, and driven them from several towns; indeed, from what we can learn, they have now risen with renewed determination, so that, as far as we can forsee, the prospects for peace are further off than ever, and we apprehend that that country will now become the arena for scenes of similar strife and turmoil which has before torn up the different States of Central America. The Indians being so much more numerous than the Spaniards, they must inevitably gain the ascendancy if they persevere, despite the assistance rendered the Spaniards by foreigners.

By intelligence received from that quarter, we are informed that the Spaniards left Bacalar on the 6th inst., for the purpose of ransacking the corn fields and plantations made by the Indians, who, hearing of their intentions, met and gave them battle, killing four officers and several soldiers.

On the 9th, a troop of one thousand Spaniards, divided into three companies, advanced toward Chichinha, and were again met by the Indians, who attacked and beat them on all sides. A deserter from Bacalar says that all the troops are afraid, and are deserting whenever they can.

Slave Excitement in Detroit Ended.—A correspondent of the Buffalo Courier, writing from Detroit, Oct. 15, states that the negro excitement has somewhat subsided. The military was on Friday night withdrawn from the jail yard, since which time a police has been on duty. On Saturday night a large meeting was held, at which the Mayor presided, and speeches were made by Hon. K. S. Bingham, Messrs. Joy and Emmons, and others. The meeting was large and enthusiastic. Yesterday a subscription of $500 was raised for the purchase of the negro. It was headed by H. Ledyard, Esq., son-in-law of Gen. Cass, with $50. The negro was last night released from custody. He said he had always been treated in the kindest manner, and regretted that he had caused all this excitement, His owner, who is a brother of Hon. Mr. Rose, of Geneva, paid all expenses, to the amount of about $200, pocketing the $300 as the value of the negro, and left for home. So the great insurrection has at last ended.

This morning large numbers of negroes are crowding over to Sandwich, Canada. We do not anticipate any further trouble, for fugitives will hereafter be cautious how they remain in town.

Indian Affairs in Texas.—The Washington Union says:—It is believed from rumors and appearances, that a general confederation of the Indian tribes along the interior portion of Texas, Arkansas, and New Mexico, are preparing for a foray into the defenseless settlements of that State. Their head quarters are to be fixed on the Brazos River, a little below the Camanche Peak, one of the most central and commanding positions in the interior of Texas. From this point they can sally forth upon any of the frontier settlements, and cut them off before succor could reach them. This is a most formidable combination, and requires the immediate and efficient notice of the government.

Cannon Balls and Locomotives.—According to the experiments of Dr. Hutton, it appeared that the time of flight of a cannon ball having a range of 6,700 feet is one quarter of a minute. The velocity was, therefore, 26,800 feet per minute, which is equal to five miles per minute or 300 miles per hour. It follows, therefore, that a railway train, moving at 75 miles an hour, not an uncommon speed for express trains to attain, would have a velocity only four times less than a cannon ball The momentum of such a mass moving at such speed is difficult to conceive. It would amount to the force of a number of cannon balls, equal to one-fourth of its own weight.

Robbery and Murder.—One of the most daring robberies on record was committed at Peoria, Ill., Oct. 12th, at about 10 o'clock, on the public highway within two miles of this city. A gentleman was attacked and robbed of $1,490 by two men who had seen him draw the money at the banking house of N. B. Curtis & Co., at 9 o'clock A. M., and followed him. He has since died of his wounds. The whole city is in a state of intense excitement. Five hundred dollars reward is offered by the Mayor for the arrest of the murderers and robbers.

Dreadful Shipwreck.—The ship Rosalinda, Capt. Timpson, which sailed from Quebec about the 25th day of August for Liverpool, on the night of the 9th of September broached-to, filled, and capsized. The captain and mate were drowned in the cabin; ten seamen and two apprentices were washed overboard and drowned, and eight surviving seamen were picked up by a French vessel, and landed at St. Pierre, whence they were brought to Sydney, C. B., on the 30th ult. Two of the seamen were sick, and one was severely injured.

The Fair at Castle Garden presents to its visitors one point of attraction of a very remarkable and unique character. It is nothing less then a large Gothic Arm Chair, backed and cushioned with beautiful wrought needlework in worsted. The needlework is from the hands of the wife of one who now fills the Presidentsal Chair, Millard Fillmore, President of the United States. It is probably the first instance upon record in modern times, where the Industrial Exhibition of a great nation has been graced by the handicraft work of the wife of one who occupies the position of its Chief Magistrate. This may, it is to be hoped, excite the emulation of the fair daughters of our glorious Republic.

The Philadelphia, arrived from Chagres, brings another installment of over a million of California gold. The receipts for the month including those by the Empire City, Cherokee, Ohio, Crecent City and Philadelphia, reach three millions three hundred thousand dollars. Truly California is fully meeting the expactions of all reasonable people in the extent of her remittance of the precious metal.

SUMMARY.

A lad about 17 years of age, a son of one of the workmen, (Mr. Jasper Provost,) in Messrs. Doty & Ford's steam saw-mill, New Brunswick, N. J., was crushed to a complete pulp on Saturday last. He was caught in a band, and entangled around the shaft, which was making 100 revolutions per minute. The remains, when extricated, gave scarcely any evidence to the spectators that humanity had ever existed in the mass of corporeal jelly before them.

The New York Sun states, that the bell of the steamer Rhode Island, which foundered at sea, on her way to California, and some thirty or forty persons lost, has been picked up on the Azores or Western Islands, by a whaling bark. It is 200 pounds in weight, had the stamp of James S. P. Allaire, N. Y., 1836, upon it, and was attached to a broken beam, which had just buoyancy enough, though very mush eaten with worms, to sustain itself and the bell on the surface of the water.

Near Pittsylvania Court-house, Va., a short time since, Miss Anthony, a young lady in the bloom of life, whilst adjusting a camphine lamp, communicated fire to the fluid, enveloping her in a sheet of flame, by the inhalation of which her tongue and throat were horribly parched. Her father, Dr. Anthony, was also badly burned in attempting to extinguish the flames. Miss A. survived her injuries only a few hours.

By the bark Republic, from Para, we have files of the Trezedewoio and Voz Paraense to Sept. 17. The Senate of Brazil had passed six days in secret session, discussing the ammendments made by the Chamber of Deputies, to the project for the abolition of the Slave Trade, first introduced into that Chamber as early as 1837. Finally they were adopted, and the bill was passed and submitted to the Emperor for his approval. The details of the bill we are not informed of.

A man named Ryan, in the employ of Mr. Plympton, a farmer in Dracut, was shot dead by a person whose name we have not learned. It appears that some men were out gunning, and were trespassing on Plympton's land. Ryan went to warn them off, when one of them deliberately shot him dead. The murderer is known, and the officers are after him.

Mr. Edward Whidden was killed in Parsonsfield, Me. on the 14th inst. under peculiar circumstances. He was in company with another young man, engaged in obtaining fruit from a neighbor's garden, when they were shot at, and he was almost instantly killed, and the other severely wounded.

There is a very active demand for Land Warrants from the West for location and the market is firm at $130 and $140 each. There are but few to be had at $130. The demand will soon absorb all the Warrants, probably not over 8,000, which have not been already located.

Miscellaneous.

Blue Stocking Morality.

Not long ago a friend sent us a rich rare present, in the shape of the copy of a letter written twenty years ago, by a lady of great literary distinction, to her cousin, who now graces one of the most honorable official stations in the Empire State. It was written on the eve of his marriage, and accompanied a pair of blue mixed stockings, knit by herself, as a present. It was sent to us for our private and personal enjoyment; but as no restriction was imposed upon us, and as the letter is so decidedly unequaled and so entirely rich, we cannot resist the temptation to share the enjoyment of its perusal with our friends. We would only add, that it will endure being read slowly, carefully, and more than once:

"Dear Cousin:—Herewith you will receive a present of a pair of woolen stockings, knit by my own hands; and be assured, dear coz, that my friendship for you is warm as the material, active as the finger-work, and generous as the donation.

"But I consider this present as peculiarly appropriate on the occasion of your marriage. You will remark, in the first place, that there are two individuals united in one pair, who are to walk side by side, guarding against coldness, and giving comfort as long as they last. The thread of their texture is mixed, and so alas, is the thread of life. In these, however, the white is made to predominate, expressing my desire and confidence that thus it will be with the color of your existence. No black is used, for I believe your lives will be wholly free from the black passions of wrath and jealousy. The darkest color here is blue, which is excellent, where we do not make it too blue.

"Other appropriate thoughts rise to my mind in regarding these stockings. The most indifferent subjects when viewed by the mind, in a suitable frame, may furnish instructive inferences, as saith the poet:—

> "The iron dogs, the fuel and tongs,
> The bellows that have leathern lungs,
> The fire wood, ashes, and the smoke,

But to the subject. You will perceive that the tops of these stockings (by which I suppose courtship to be represented) are seamed, and by means of seaming are drawn into a snarl, but afterwards comes a time when the whole is made plain, and continues so to the end and final toeing off. By this, I wish to take occasion to congratulate yourself, that you are now through with seeming, and have come to plain reality. Again, as the whole of these comely stockings was not made at once, but by the addition of one little stitch after another, put in with skill and discretion, until the whole presents the fair and equal piece of work which you see; so, life does not consist of one great action, but milions of little ones combined; and so may it be with your lives. No stitch dropped when duties are to be performed—no widening made where bad principles are to be reproved, or economy is to be preserved; neither seeming nor narrowing where truth and generosity are in question. Thus every stitch of life made right and set in the right place—none either too large or too small, too light or too loose; thus may you keep on your smooth and even course, making existence one fair and consistent piece—until, together, having passed the heel, you come to the very toe of life, and here, in the final narrowing off, and dropping the coil of this emblematical pair of companions and comforting associates, nothing appears but white, the token of innocence and peace, of purity and light—may you, like these stockings, the final stitch being dropped, and the work completed, go together from the place where you were formed, to a happier state of existence, a present from earth to heaven. Hoping that these stockings and admonitions may meet a cordial reception, I remain, in the true blue friendship, seemly, yet without seeming, Yours, from top to toe, ———."

Germination of Wheat in Ice.

Some very interesting specimens of Wheat germinating in Ice, were exhibited to me, yesterday, by Mr. Alexander Carman, (Mr. Adolphe Mailliard's farmer,) residing near this place, taken from the bottom of his ice-house—not underneath the ice, but imbedded in it, eighteen inches from the ground—having numerous radicula of three to four inches long, shooting from the grain, in different directions, through the solid ice, while the pumule has made its way perfectly erect, as if it had no more resistance than the common pressure of the atmosphere—the ice not being softened in the least, but dry and friable.

It is generally held by naturalists, that "the conditions of germination are threefold, viz: moisture, a certain temperature, and the presence of oxygen gas. The necessity of moisture to this process has been proved by extensive observation. A certain degree of warmth is not less essential. Germination cannot take place at 32° Fahrenheit.

Without attempting to enter into any discussion of the received philosophy of germination, or to trace the necessary chemical changes, affected by heat, in the progress of incipient germination, the fact before me teaches us, that man's theories are sometimes at variance with nature's operations, and it behooves us to renew our researches and revise our dogmatic conclusions on such subjects.

Whether a sufficient evolution of heat can be generated by chemical action in seed imbedded in ice, may be solved by attention to those seeming anomalies. It is scarcely more curious, although much less explicable, than the freezing of water and the boiling of ether in vacuo, side by side, and under like circumstances, at the same instant; certainly not more singular in appearance than the combustion of the chlorate of potassium with phosphorous immersed in water, burning with a steady, inextinguishable flame, until entirely consumed. May not a play of chemical affinities, influenced by the season, (the present being the germinating season of wheat,) take place, and the quantum of heat required to promote the conversion of the starch of the cotyledons into the semi-fluid substance, consisting of sugar and gum, ordained to nourish the quickened embryo plant. The elucidation of this point will settle the whole difficulty.

At first sight, I was inclined to attribute this singular phenomenon to accidental dislodgement of sprouted seed from adjacent soil, in that advanced stage of germination, which floating in the water was afterwards frozen; but upon careful inquiry I found—1st. That no wheat had been grown within half a mile of the pond from which the ice was taken. 2d. That it is Italian wheat, which Mr. Mailliard brought from Florence a few years since, and thus can be identified. That it has not been planted on the property in which the pond lies—that there is no water communication between the grain fields and the pond. 3d. That the fibres of the radicle are perfectly white and transparent, almost gelatinous, not having the tinge, nor the consistence of soil-grown shoots.

On the contrary, I have the most satisfactory evidence, that the germination has taken place since the ice was packed away. 1st. The straw of the Italian wheat was used in packing the ice-house. 2d. The germinating seeds are found between two pieces of ice consolidated together. 3d. I have one specimen of the grain growing from the ear, attached to a full stalk of straw, sprouting in like manner—which had, most unequivocally, been dropped on a lower layer of ice, and was covered by another stratum.

On another occasion, I may trace this subject farther; for which I must await the result of some experiments I have just instituted, to test some matters in connexion with it; but communicate this cursory notice, at this time, to elicit any other facts which may elucidate the question.

Electro-Magnetism as a Motive Power.

Professor Page, in the Lectures which he is now delivering before the Smithsonian Institute, states that there is no longer any doubt of the application of this power as a substitute for steam. He exhibited the most imposing experiments ever witnessed in this branch of science. An immense bar of iron, weighing one hundred and sixty pounds, was made to spring up by magnetic action, and to move rapidly up and down, dancing like a feather in the air, without any visible support. The force operating upon the bar, he stated to average three hundred pounds through ten inches of its motion. He said he could raise this bar one hundred feet as readily as through ten inches, and he expected no difficulty in doing the same with a bar weighing one ton, or a hundred tons. He could make a pile driver, or a forge hammer, with great simplicity, and could make an engine with a stroke of six twelve, twenty, or any number of feet.

The most beautiful experiment we ever witnessed was the loud sound and brilliant flash from the galvanic spark, when produced near a certain point in his great magnet. Each snap was as loud as a pistol; and when he produced the same spark at a little distance from this point, it made no noise at all. This recent discovery is said to have a practical bearing upon the construction of an electro-magnatic engine. Truly a great power is here; and where is the limit to it?

He then exhibited his engine of between four and five horse power operated by a battery continued within a space of three cubic feet. It looked very unlike a magnetic mahine. It was a reciprocating engine of two feet stroke, and the whole engine and battery weighed about one ton. When the power was thrown on by the motion of a lever, the engine started off magnificently, making one hundred and fourteen strokes per minute; though, when it drove a circular saw ten inches in diameter, sawing up boards an inch and a quarter thick into laths, the engine made but eighty strokes per minute.

The most important and interesting point, however, is the expense of the power. Professor Page stated that he had reduced the cost so far, that it was less than steam under many and most conditions, though not so low as the cheapest steam engines. With all the imperfections of the engines, the consumption of three pounds of zinc per day would produce one horse power. The larger his engine, (contrary to what has been known before,) the greater the economy. Professor Page was himself surprised, at the result. There were yet practical difficulties to be overcome; the battery had yet to be improved; and it remained yet to try the experiment on a grander scale, to make a power of one hundred horse, or more. Good Bread.

"The Arabs always allow a man to divorce himself from a wife who does not make good bread. Were such a law in our country, half the young married ladies, we fear, would be in danger of falling back into single blessedness."

We wish it were in our power to pronounce this a slander upon young American wives, but are compelled, reluctantly though it be, to admit the full force of the allegation. We doubt, very much, if seven out of ten married woman, old or young, in our larger cities, know how to make good bread; and yet upon good bread depends the health of husbands and children. The production of an article of diet, so essential, is left, in most cases, to ignorant cooks, or to bakers. How the former do their work, the dyspeptic stomachs of thousands can tell; and the same delicate organs can answer for the art of the baker, which often consists in making the whitest and the lightest bread out of the poorest and cheapest flour. As a generel thing, bakers use the lower brands of flour; and, too often, damaged flour, because obtained at a cheaper rate. The whiteness is in many cases, deceptive, and we fear, it is too frequently the result of foreign and deleterious substances. There are, of course, honorable and praiseworthy exeptions to this, and housekeepers who buy bread, instead of baking it at home, should be very sure that they deal with those who use a good article of flour. Such are to be found in all our large cities. [Arthur's Home Gazette.

Apples for Human Food.

The importance of apples, as food, has not hitherto been sufficiently estimated in this country, nor understood. Besides contributing a large portion of sugar, mucilage, and other nutritive matter, in the form of food, they contain such a fine combination of vegetable acids, abstractive substances, and aromatic principles, with the nutritive matter as to act powerfully in the capacity of refrigerants, tonics, and antiseptics; and, when freely used at the season of ripeness, by rural laborers and others, they prevent debility, strengthen digestion, correct the putrefactive tendencies of nitrogenous food, avert scurvy, and probably maintain and strengthen the powers of productive labor. "The operators of Cornwall, in England, consider ripe apples nearly as nourishing as bread, and more so than potatoes. In the year 1801, a year of scarcity, apples, instead of being converted into cider, were sold to the poor; and the laborers asserted that they could stand their work on baked apples without meat; whereas a potato diet required meat or fish." The French and Germans use apples extensively; indeed, it is rare that they sit down, in the rural districts, without them in some shape or other, even at the best tables. The laborers and mechanics depend on them, to very great extent, as an article of food, and frequently dine on sliced apples and bread. Stewed with rice, red cabbage, carrots, or by themselves, with a little sugar and milk, they make both a pleasant and nutritious dish.

Profits of Fruit Culture.

The following facts, exhibiting the large profit which may be derived from the skillful culture of fruits, are furnished by S. W. Cole, of Boston, who is a remarkable fruit gatherer, and who remarks, "We give some extreme cases, and others which common skill may compass. The cultivator will do well with medium success. Yet it is well to have a standard of extraordinary attainment, or the perfection of excellence, as a goal for those who inscribe on the banner excelsior.

"Mr. Moses Jones, of Brookline, in this vicinity, a most skillful cultivator, set one hundred and twelve apple trees two rods apart, and peach trees between both ways. The eighth year he had two hundred and twenty-eight barrels of apples, and in a few years from setting the trees, $400 worth of peaches in one year; and the best part of the story is, that large crops of vegetables were raised on the same land, nearly paying for the manure and labor. The tenth year from the setting many of the apple trees produced four or five barrels each, the lands still yielding good crops of vegetables, the peach trees being mostly gone by old age. Mr. Jones grafted a tolerably large pear tree to the Bartlett, and the third year it produced $30 worth.

"Mr. S. Dudley, a very successful cultivator in Roxbury, an adjoining city, sold the crop of currants from one-eighth of an acre, for $108, the next year for $125, and he had good crops for several years. He picked five hundred quart boxes from one-eigth of an acre, the next season after setting the bushes in the fall. He had $35 worth of cherries from one Mizzard tree.

"We saw, in Natick, Massachusetts, on the banks of the 'Classic Charlie,' on the farm of M. Eames, Esq., an apple tree grafted to the Porter when seventy-five years old; it soon bore, and the seventh year it produced fifteen barrels, which sold at $30. The original Hurlbut apple tree produced forty bushels in one year and twenty the next. The original Bars apple yield sixty bushels in one year. N. Wyeth, Esq., Cambridge, in this region, had from a Harvard pear tree nine barrels of fruit which sold for $45.

"A farmer would not plant an orchard, thinking he should not live to eat the fruit; his son had the same views; but the grandson planted for posterity, yet his predecessors shared in the fruit also, for the grandfather drank hogsheads of the cider.

"Hovey states that a Dix pear tree in Cambridge, produced $46 worth of fruit at one crop. We saw in Orange, New Jersey, one hundred bushels of apples on a Harrison tree, which would make ten barrels of cider, then selling at $10 a barrel in New York.

"Downing says that the original Dubois Early Golden Apricot, produced $45 worth in 1844, $50 in 1845, $90 in 1846. A correspondent of the Horticulturist says that Mr. Hill Pennell, Darby, Pennsylvania, has a grape vine that has produced seventy-five bushels yearly, which sell at $1 a bushel. James Laws, Philadelphia, has a Washington plum that yields six bushels a year that would sell for sixty dollars. Judge Linn, Carlisle, Pennsylvania, has two Apricot trees that yielded five bushels each worth $120. Mr. Hugh Hatch, of Camden, New Jersey, has four apple trees that prodnced one hundred and forty bushels, ninety bushels of which sold at $1 dollar each. In 1844, a tree of the Lady Apple, at Fishkill Landing, New York, yielded 15 barrels that sold for $45.

What a Prudent Wife Did.

A correspondent of the National Era relates the following:—

"A fact which I came in possession of a couple of years ago, may illustrate the character of the New Englanders, and reveal the origin of some branches of their most profitable business. S. W. was the son of a country clergyman, and was accustomed to laboring on a farm in summer, and keeping school in winter. He was moral, industrious, and frugal, and took a wife possessing the same qualities, together with the shrewd propensity to calculate the cost of all articles of living. One day her husband brought home the cloth and trimmings for a new coat. The wife inquired the price of the buttons, which she noticed were made of cloth called 'lasting,' or, more fully, 'everlasting,' covered on wooden button-molds. She thought she could afford as good a button, made by hand, for less money. The next day, like the true daughter of a Yankee, she 'tried the thing out.' She bought the cloth by the yard and the molds by the dozen; and in a week she had better buttons, at a less price, in the market. The thing would pay. S. W. soon left farming and school-keeping, bought the cloth, which his wife cut into button-covers, and button-molds, hired the women and girls of the neighboring towns to make them up, and sold them at great profits. Soon another entered into partnership with him, and invented machinery to do the work. Then the plain lasting was changed to figured velvet, and satin, and twist. Improvement on improvement in machinery was made, till they equaled the best English, or French, or German buttons. S. W. now owns one of the sweetest villages in Connecticut valley, and almost supplies the United States with buttons for coats and overcoats. He has endowed an academy munificently; has contributed like a prince to the funds of a highly distinguished and useful female seminary, and has rescued a noble college from embarrassment. So much for the carefulness of a prudent wife; and so much for a disposition to earn an honest living in some way, rather than thrive in idleness on the hard and too often unrequited toil of others."

The Pin and the Needle.

Lem Smith, the philosophical editor of the Madison Record, tells the following witty fable, which is as good as anything we have seen out of Æsop. A pin and a needle, says this American Fontaine, being neighbors in a work-basket and both being idle, began to quarrel, as idle folks are apt to do:

"I should like to know," said the pin, "what you are good for, and how you expect to get through the world without a head?" "What is the use of your head," replied the needle, rather sharply, "if you have no eye?" "What is the use of an eye," said the pin, "if there is always something in it?" "I am more active, and can go through more work than you can," said the needle. "Yes, but you will not live long." "Why not?" "Because you have always a stitch in your side," said the pin. "You are a poor, crooked creature," said the needle. "And you are so proud that you can't bend without breaking your back." "I'll pull your head off, if you insult me again." "I'll put your eye out if you touch me; remember your life hangs by a single thread," said the pin. While they were thus conversing, a little girl entered, and undertaking to sew, she very soon broke off the needle at the eye. Then she tied the thread around the neck of the pin, and attempting to sew with it, she soon pulled its head off, and threw it into the dirt by the side of the broken needle. "Well, here we are," said the needle. "We have nothing to fight about now," said the pin. "It seems misfortune has brought us to our senses." "A pity we had not come to them sooner," said the needle. "How much we resemble human beings, who quarrel about their blessings till they lose them, and never find out they are brothers till they lay down in the dust together as we do."

Gigantic Birds.

A considerable doubt hung over the accounts from time to time detailed in the American journals and other publications, concerning those novel and extraordinary discoveries, until they were more than matched by the actual exhumation of the entire skeletons of the feathery tribes far exceeding in dimensions any thing hitherto dreamed of in the science of ornithology. The collections of Mr. Williams and of Mr. W. Mantell, from the alluvial deposits of New Zealand, utterly confounded all previous calculations as to the size and bulk attainable by the bird tribe. The tibia of a Dinornis, in the collection of the University of Edinburgh, measures thirty-one inches, the average circumference of both being nearly 12 inches. From the foot to the top of the clavicle, the animal must have stood at least 13 feet in hight. With the strut of the turkey or the pride of the peacock—head and neck of corresponding attitude—what a denizen for the wilds and forests of this region of the new world! When animals of similar dimensions, but of an erlier epoch, frequented the beaches of Great Britain, we have to imagine the Cumbrian mountains, the Penine chain Derby Peak, and the lofty clifts of Avon, surrounded by an inland sea stretching by central France, the Black Forest, and the Hartz mountains, and the shores all round, silted with the materials which now constitute the triassic group. Tortoises, turtles, birdheaded lizards, birds themselves, salamander froglike creatures, larger than crockodiles, resorted as now to the seashore, in the cool fresh of the evening or as tide-mark permitted, and regaled themselves at will on the food which an ever bounteous element furnished to their various wants. Development of the Lungs.

"Much has been said and written upon diet eating and drinking, but I do not recollect ever noticing a remark in any writer upon breathing, or the manner of breathing. Multitudes, and especially ladies in easy circumstances, contract a vicious and destructive mode of breathing. They suppress their breathing, and contract the habit of short, quick breathing, not carrying the breath half way down the chest and scarcely expanding the lower portions of the chest at all. Lacing the bottom of chest also greatly increases this evil, and confirms a bad habit of breathing. Children that move about a great deal in the open air, and in no way laced, breathe deep and full to the bottom of the chest, and every part of it. So also with most out door laborers, and persons who take a great deal of exercise in the open air, because the lungs give us the power of action, and the more exercise we take, especially out of doors, the larger the lungs become, and the less liable to disease. In all occupations that require standing, keep the person straight. If at a table, let it be high, raised up nearly to the arm-pits, so as not to require you to stoop; you will find the employment much easier—not one half so fatiguing; whilst the form of the chest, and the symmetry of the figure, will remain perfect. You have noticed that a vast many tall ladies stoop, whilst a great many short ones are straight. This arises, I think, from the table at which they sit or work, or occupy themselves, or study, being of a medium hight; far too low for a tall person, and about right for a short person. This should be carefully corrected, and regarded, so that each lady may occupy herself at a table suited to her, and thus prevent the possibility or necessity of stooping.

Influence of a Daughter.

In one of the counties of Western Virginia, there lived a man who for many years had been an officer of the church, and whose piety no one doubted. While active and earnest in most religious duties, one thing was wanting—he had no family altar. Years had passed without it, till God in mercy visited that circle. The heart of the elder was gladdened by seeing one of his daughters embrace the Savior. This babe in Christ felt that there was one thing wanting to her growth in piety—she needed the blessings that distill on those that gather around the altar of prayer. She felt too diffident to introduce the subject to her father, who had grown grey in the service of the Lord; but piety prompted an expedient. She had obtained from a colporteur the Tract "Do you pray in your family?" and one evening as the family had gathered around the fireside, she presented it to her father, and simply asked him to read it. He took it and read it with fixed attention. Every word was an arrow that reached his heart. He finished the tract, paused, remained in thought a moment, and looking at his daughter burst out into tears and said, "Daughter, bring me the Bible. I have neglected my duty too long: henceforth I will pray in my family." He kept his resolution, and every morning and evening witnessed a group of worshippers gathering to the daily sacrifice. From that day a new and brighter light shone into that dwelling. [Am. Mess.

Manlike and Godlike.

A gentleman who had filled many high stations in public life, with the greatest honor to himself and advantage to the nation, once went to Sir Earldley Wilmot, in great anger at a real injury that he had received from a person high in the political world, which he was considering how to resent in the most effectual manner. After relating the particulars to Sir Earldley, he asked if he did not think it would be manly to resent it? "Yes," said Sir Earldley, "it would doubtless be manly to resent it, but it would be godlike to forget it."

This the gentleman declared had such an instantaneous effect upon him, that he came away quite another man and in temper entirely altered from that in which he went.

How this little incident touches the heart—A mother who was in the habit of asking her children, before they retired at night, what they had done during the day to make others happy, found a young twin daughter silent. The elder ones spoke modestly of deeds and dispositions, founded on the golden rule, "Do unto others as you would they should do unto you." Still the little bright face was bowed down in silence. The question was repeated, and the dear little child said timidly:—"A little girl who sat by me on the bench at school had lost a baby brother. All the time she studied her lesson she hid her face in her book and cried. I felt so sorry that I laid my face on the same book and cried with her. Then she looked up and put her arms around my neck, but I do not know why she said I had done her so much good."

The Snow Trade of Sicily.

The principle export from Cantania is snow, in which a very lucrative trade is carried on with Malta, and some parts of the south of Italy. It is collected during the winter in pits and hollows in the mountain, and covered with the scoriæ and asher, to prevent its thawing. It is brought down on mules to the coast at night, in panniers covered with leaves. The revenue derived from this source is immense, and renders the Prince of Paterno one of the richest men in Sicily. Snow is the universal luxury, from the highest to the lowest ranks. It is sold at the rate of two pence a rotolo, or thirty ounces; and the poorest cobbler would sooner deprive himself of his dinner than of his glass of "acqua gelate." It is also extensively used in the hospitals, and scarcity of it would be considered a great misfortune as a famine, or any other national visitation, and would more infallibly occasion popular tumults. To guard against any such accidents, the government at Naples have made the providing it a monopoly, the contractor being required to give security to the amount of 90,000 ducats, which sum is forfeited if it can be proved that for one hour the supply was not equal to the demand.

Starch from Indian Corn.—Many of our readers are not aware of the extent of this new branch of manufacture, which we hope soon to see take the place of whiskey distilleries in the consumption of our great American staple, Indian corn. There is now in operation at Oswego, New York, a manufactory that consumes 2000 bushels of corn a week, which makes 40,000 lbs., of the whitest and most beautiful starch for all domestic purposes, whether for the laundry, or pantry. The building is 130 by 190 feet, five stories high, (to which an addition is about being erected,) and contains 200 cisterns for precipitating the starch, eleven furnaces with drying rooms, and employs about 70 men, and manufactures $120,000 worth of starch annually. There are two other similar establishments in the United States, and yet the demand is constantly increasing.

An Adroit Theif.—On Thursday last, says the Brighton (Eng.) Guardian, a man, dressed as a mechanic, went to a house in Brighton, walked up stairs, took a bed from the bedstead, made it up into a bundle, and brought it down into the passage. At that instant he heard somebody coming. Thereupon, with admirable coolness, he gave two or three loud taps on the wainscoting, and when in due time one of the inmates made her appearance, he said, "I've brought this bed." "Bed," replied the woman, "there's no bed to come here; you must have made a mistake." "I think not," said the man; "this is No. 15, isn't it?" "Yes, this is 15." "Then that is the number master told me to bring it to." "Well," said the woman, "it's wrong, at any rate; so you'd better take it away." "If you say I'm to take it," responded the thief, "I had better do so," and with that he took up the bed and walked off. Some time elapsed before it was discovered how completely the bed-owner had been done.

The Price of a Flower.—M. Dutens, a traveler in Holland, (we cannot ascertain the year) says:—I was witness to a circumstance I could not otherwise have believed, respecting the price of flowers in Holland. I saw four hundred and seventy-five guineas offered and refused for a hyacinth. It was, to be sure, the most charming flower that ever was seen; it belonged to a florist at Hague, and another florist offered this price for it. The reason which the owner gave me for refusing the offer was, that his hyacinth was known to all the amateurs in Europe, and that he sold the bulbs every year for more than the interest of five hundred guineas.

Growth of Cincinnati.—Cist, the statistical, says there is nothing in all history or observation to parallel the growth of Cincinnati. The man, Asa Bolcomb, is yet living who saw the first cellar dug in that city. The man, Jeremiah Butterfield, is yet living, who assisted Israel Ludlow in surveying and laying out the streets, sixty years ago. He landed there in 1786, on his way to St. Louis, when not a single white dwelt between the two Miamis. He survives to behold the county in which he resides comprehending a population of almost 200,000 inhabitants.

Classes will be formed in Latin, French, and German, at the commencement of the Fall Term; in Hebrew, Greek, and Spanish, at the commencement of the Winter Term, and continue through the course of study.

In Mathematics, Geometry is studied in the Fall, Trigonometry and Conic Sections in the Winter, and Astronomy, Surveying, Navigation, &c., in the Summer Term.

The course of instruction in Agriculture is thorougly scientific, embracing study and recitation in the best authors. Instruction is given in a well-furnished laboratory, in the analysis of soils, ashes of plants, manures, &c. and the modes of testing for their constituent elements. The attention of farmers who wish to give their sons a practical education is especially called to this department.

A CATHOLIC SERVICE IN HAYTI.

Correspondence of the Independent.

A few evenings since, as I was taking a walk through the city, I met a crier ringing his bell, and announcing some proclamation; but as it was not in French I could not understand the purport of it. The voice of a crier always attracts attention here, as in this way all orders, laws, creations of nobility, &c., are published through the city. Calling at the house of a friend, I learned that it was a government order that the city be illuminated on that and the next evening, and that the next day would be observed as a "fête" (festival) day, when masses would be said for all the heroes who had died in battle since the first revolution on the island. It was announced, moreover, that this fête was by order and at the expense of the Empress. While sitting with this family, I happened to cast my eyes into the street, and observed that it was lighter than usual. Ordinarily the streets are very dark, as there are no provisions for lighting them. I walked out of the door at once, in order to have a full view of the demonstration. On looking down the street, which is one of the finest in the city, I saw one, two, three, or more lamps or small wax candles, placed upon the side-walk before each door, and twinkling away to the full extent of their capabilities; and this was the illumination. The ordinary light shed by the lamps in the streets of New York, compared with this, is as mid-day to star-light. Yet even this meager affair had caused many a poor family to pay out "lobs" for these little wax candles that they would gladly have expended for plantains or something else to satisfy the cravings of hunger.

But slim as this commencement was, I was aware that the "grand service" at the church would be quite a different affair, and well worth seeing, as the Emperor and entire court would be present. I therefore made my way to church before seven o'clock the next morning. Several companies of soldiers had already arrived, and others were approaching. The church is a large, low, wooden edifice, built in the cheapest style. It is surrounded on all sides by a pavement ten or fifteen feet wide, which is covered by the extension of the roof of the church. This outer gallery, as it is termed, is esteemed as much a part of the church, and is usually as much occupied as the part that is enclosed.

The church was most monstrously and masoncally decorated, with folds of black cloth, completely dotted over with "skull and bones," cut from white paper, interspersed with small pieces of paper intended to represent the heart. These were suspended profusely about the pillars, door-posts, altar and other parts of the church, making quite a miniature Golgotha. About mid-way from the altar to the front door, a hearse-like structure was erected, covered over with black cloth, and surrounded with crosses, candles, &c., to represent the tomb of the departed dead, for the repose of whose souls this ceremony was made. Here, having surveyed the scene, I had the fortune to meet a "chevalier" with whom I was acquainted, who very kindly offered to secure me a seat that I could not otherwise obtain, which would afford me a full view of the Emperor, Empress, and other distinguished persons; and also of the altar and all that was passing.

Companies of soldiers were drawn up on different sides of the church, and around the square that fronts the church, and several pieces of cannon were stationed near by. The Senate had arrived in a body under an escort of soldiers. Some other distinguished persons were then escorted to the church with great pomp. Then a signal was given that the Emperor was near; and at once the air was rent with ringing of bells, the thunder of cannon, the stirring strains of bands of music, and the more martial sounds of the bugle, the fife, and the drums. In the midst of this tumultuous demonstration, the Emperor and cortége arrived, and halted before the church-door. He rode a very good gray horse, and was accompanied by several generals and a large body-guard on horseback. The Empress, and her daughter, about ten or twelve years of age, were in a carriage, preceded by three or four other carriages, in which were some of the most distinguished ladies of the court. I had secured a position which afforded me a perfect view of this scene. As the company arrived, l'Abbe Cessans, the head priest of the island, accompanied by two other priests, came out of the church, and met the Emperor upon the steps, bowed to him graciously, and conducted him to his seat near the altar; the Dutchesses, Countesses, &c., came out of the church in a body, met the Empress at her carriage, and conducted her to her seat. I then took my reserved seat, which was immediately in front of the Emperor and family, and but a few feet from them.

The internal structure of Catholic churches is peculiar; the body of the church is without seats, and is occupied by persons who either stand or occupy chairs which they bring with them. The only permanent seats in the church are those of the Emperor and family, and two long pews or boxes on each side of the broad aisle, extending lengthwise of the church, from the altar towards the door. On the right side of this aisle, near the altar, and in range with the long seats, were seated the Emperor and his family; his seat elevated above others like a little pulpit. On either side of this, are seats a little lower than his, yet higher than the other seats in the church. In the one on the right was seated the Empress and princess, and on the left five ladies of rank. The long seats on one side of the aisle were occupied by the Senate in a body, and on the left by titled dignitaries. On each side of the church, directly behind these long seats, a company of soldiers with fixed bayonets were stationed inside of the railing that surrounds the altar. In the aisle, near the altar, were seated the ladies of the court, and next in order after them came the generals and other military officers. In the space between the altar enclosure and the long seats on the left, and immediately in front of the Emperor, was seated your correspondent. Here I remained for three long hours, witnessing the service for the dead, while hundreds of soldiers were standing outside of the church, sweltering in the hot sun, and as I well knew, suffering from the terrible gnawings of hunger.

I cannot undertake a description of all that I witnessed—crossing, bowing, turning around, kneeling, chanting, burning incense, scattering holy-water, marching and counter-marching with crosses and candles, &c., &c.

All this was but the priests' part. There was an accompaniment of kneeling, bowing and crossing, giving and executing orders to "order arms," "shoulder arms," "present arms," &c., on the part of those in the church; and, outside, the ringing of bells and firing of cannon. But there were parts of the service not to be passed over in this general manner. A quantity of small cakes, resembling common tea-cakes, were brought in, and underwent a process of manipulation. This done, the beadle cleared a passage from the altar to the Emperor's seat; and the priest, with a small basket of this bread, advanced towards the Emperor, bowed very low, ascended the steps to him, bowed again, and then extended the basket of cakes, and the Emperor took one from it. The priest bowed low, retired a few steps, turned around, again bowed, and ascended to the Emperor, who returned the cake to the basket. The same ceremony was performed with the Empress and princess, the entire congregation standing. Then the bread was passed around to the titled persons present, and afterward to the rest of the congregation, who put their cake into their pockets, as is the universal custom here.

Still later in the service, the priest took from the altar what looked like a small gold plate, about six inches in diameter; and holding it with a small napkin in one hand, and covering it with a small napkin in the other, he approached the Emperor in the same manner as before, and, ascending to him, uncovered the plate and the Emperor kissed it. The priest wiped the plate, bowed and retired, and the same process was gone through by the Empress and princess. This done, the Emperor dropped into the hand of the Empress some pieces of money, which she immediately placed in a basket borne by another priest. I could not tell the amount, but judged by the chink that it was three or four doubloons. After this the priest retired within the altar, and the other dignitaries present led up their wives, and each taking a lighted candle in one hand, kissed the plate, deposited his gift, and retired to give place to others. This was the most animated part of the entire performances, and was much enjoyed by all, especially by the priest. His countenance fairly glowed with delight, and it did not seem possible that he could rave, as he did of late, even for a Bible agent. The kissing went on until plain old women and little children came up, who could only pay in coppers, after which the plate was soon wiped up and laid away.

I have not been able to learn the object of this ceremony. There was some embossed work upon the plate, which was kissed. Some have told me that it was the cover of the communion-cup; and others, that it was the plate that contained the "offering." Whatever it was, it seemed to be scarcely less sacred than the Pope's toe.

As the closing ceremony in the church, the priests with their attendants, and the Emperor with his court, and others, advanced from their places to the "tomb" in the center of the church, where bowings, crossing, manipulations, and a long list of other services were gone through with, after which the congregation retired. The Emperor, with his escort and guards, took a turn through the principal streets of the city to his residence, while the Empress and other attendants proceeded home by a more direct route.

ANECDOTE OF DR. MAXCEY.

On one occasion, several of the students of South Carolina College resolved to drag the Doctor's carriage into the woods, and fixed upon a night for the performance of the exploit. One or their number, however, was troubled with some compunctuous visitings, and managed to convey to the worthy President a hint, that it would be well for him to secure the door of his carraige-house. Instead of paying any heed to this suggestion, the Doctor proceeded on the appointed night, to the carraige-house, and esconced his portly person inside the vehicle. In less than an hour, some half a dozen young gentlemen came to his retreat, and cautiously withdrew the carriage into the road. When they were fairly out of the College precincts they forgot their reserve, and began to joke freely with each other by name. One of them complained of the weight of the carraige, and another replied, by swearing that "it was heavy enough to have the old fellow himself in it." For nearly a mile they proceeded along the highway, and then struck into the woods, to a cover which they concluded would effectually conceal the vehicle. Making themselves infinitely merry at the Doctor's expense, and conjecturing how and when he would find his carriage, they at length reached the spot where they had resolved to leave it. Just as they were about to depart—having once more agreed that "the carraige was heavy enough to have the old Doctor and all his tribe in it"—they were startled by the sudden dropping of one of the glass-door panels, and by the well-known voice of the Doctor himself, who thus addressed them:—"So, so, young gentlemen, you are going to leave me in the woods, are you? Surely, as you have brought me hither for your own gratification, you will not refuse to take me back for mine! Come, Messrs. ———, and ———, and ———, buckle to, and let us return; it's getting late!" There was no appeal; for the window was raised, and the Doctor resumed his seat. Almost without a word, the discomfitted young gentlemen took their places at the pole, and at the back of the vehicle, and quite as expeditiously, if with less noise, did they retrace their course. In silence, they dragged the carraige into its wonted place, and then precipitately retreated to their rooms, to dream of the account they must render on the morrow. When they had gone, the Doctor quietly vacated the carriage, and went to his house, where he related to his family with great glee the occurrence. He never called the heroes of that nocturnal expedition to an account, nor was his carriage ever afterwards dragged at night into the woods!

A GEM FROM JUDSON.

The following letter was written by the lamented Judson, to his friend and brother missionary, Osgood, in this country, on the death of his wife. Some few paragraphs are omitted. What a brilliant imagination Judson must have possessed! How chastened was it by grace! "The light in your dwelling," "the cup stirred by the finger of God," "the well-curb of the fountain of living water,"—are they not beautiful?

MAULMAIN, Oct. 21, 1843.

"So, the light in your dwelling has gone out, my poor brother, and it is all darkness there, only as you draw down, by faith, some faint gleams of the light of heaven, and coldness has gathered around your hearth-stone —your house is probably desolate—your children scattered, and you a houseless wanderer over the face of the land. We have both tasted of the bitter cups once and again; we have found them bitter, and we have found them sweet too—every cup stirred by the finger of God, becomes sweet to the humble believer. Do you remember how our late wives, and sister Stevens, and perhaps some others, used to cluster around the well-curb in the Mission compound at the close of day? I can almost see them sitting there, with their smiling faces, as I look out of the window at which I am now writing. Where are ours now? Clustering around the well-curb of the fountain of living water, to which the Lamb of Heaven shows them the way—reposing in the arms of Infinite Love, who wipes away all their tears with his own hands. Let us travel on and look up. We shall soon be there, as sure as I write, or you read these lines. Many a weary step we may yet have to take. but we shall surely get there at last. And the longer and more tedious the way, the sweeter will be our repose.

"I am still hard at work on the Dictionary, and shall be for a year more, if I live as long; I hope then to get into more congenial employ. However, I would not choose for myself—work of all sorts must be done, and it is a great privilege to be allowed to do anything for the King of kings, the Lord of hosts. * * * * Yours ever,

A. JUDSON.

A SCENE IN HAWAII.

The Congregational Journal quotes the following from a paper published in the Sandwich Islands. The description here given is from the pen of a gentleman visiting those islands, and furnishes a striking proof of the renewing power of the Gospel:—

On the following morning, having risen earlier than my companions, I directed one of the Indians to make up the fire, and in the meantime I strolled off to walk among some of the neighboring huts. From one of them I heard the continued utterance of monotonous sounds; and, upon looking in at the door, I saw a man kneeling on a mat in the corner, praying aloud, whilst the various members of the family, old and young, knelt in a row near him. The only words which I could understand, were "Ehovah," and "Luna," the former word, of course, given them from our language, and the latter from their own, signifying above.

What a scene! and what words from the hut of a native, on the wild volcanic mountains of Hawaii! among a people the last born of civilized discovery, many of whom, Christians of no more than adult years, bear on their persons the marks of barbarian customs. As a careless member of a community to which Christianity is a birthright trust, I felt rebuked. Never, in the dim religious light, and amid the solemn paraphernalia of Art's sacred temples, did I feel such an impulse to devotion, and involuntarily my own spirit of adoration was borne along with that of those humble worshipers.

ANECDOTE OF JOHN FLETCHER.

A young minister of the Wesleyan Church in England, received his first appointment to the circuit including the town of Madeley, at that time favored with the ministerial labors of Rev. John Fletcher. He was directed, on reaching Madeley, to inquire for Mr. F.'s residence, where he would meet with a welcome reception. On riding up to the house he called or knocked, when an elderly servant, as he supposed, in ordinary clothing, met the summons. "Is this Mr. Fletcher's residence?" "It is, sir." "My name is ——, the junior preacher for this circuit." "Yes, sir, the family have been expecting you; dismount and walk in." "No, my man, I make it an invariable rule to see my horse attended to first: take him to the stable; get your curry-comb and brush, and curry him down!" The old man, in compliance with his directions, performed the duties of hostler. "Now give him his provender, and I'll go into the house." "Walk in, sir; take a seat." Looking round, and seeing no one but the old hostler, he inquired, "Where is Mr. Fletcher?" "I AM MR. FLETCHER!" His surprise and mortification can be better imagined than described, but the excellent Fletcher told him not to distress himself, but let it be a lesson for the future, not to infer that because a man wears rusty clothes at home, he must be a hostler.

ANGLO-GERMAN SACRED POETRY.

The Kirchenfreund magazine, published at Mercersburg, and edited by the learned Professor Schaff, has a series of "Specimens of Anglo-German Church Poetry," being translations in English of German hymns. We copy the English of one of them, from the pen of Professor James W. Alexander. The original is by Hartmann:

1. Now the crucible is breaking!
Now my faith its seal is taking;
Molton gold unhurt by fire,
Only thus 'tis ever given,
Up to joys of highest heaven,
For God's children to aspire.

2. Thus, by griefs, the Lord is moulding
Mind and spirit, here unfolding
His own image, to endure.
Now he shapes our dust, but later
Is the inner-man's Creator;
Thus he works by trial sure.

3. Sorrows quell our insurrection,
Bring our members to subjection,
Under Christ's prevailing will;
While the broken powers he raises
To the work of holy praises
Quietly and softly still.

4. Sorrows gather home the senses
Lest, seduced by earth's pretences,
They should after idols stroll.
Like an angel guard, repelling
Evil from the inmost dwelling,
Bringing order to the soul.

5. Sorrow now the harp is stringing
For the everlasting singing,
Teaching us to soar above;
Where the blessed choir, palm-bearing,
Harps are playing, crowns are wearing,
Round the throne with songs of love.

6. Sorrow makes alert and daring;
Sorrow is the soul's preparing
For the cold rest of the grave.
Sorrow is a herald, hasting,
Of that springtide whose unwasting
Health the dying soul shall save.

7. Sorrow makes our faith abiding;
Lowly, child-like, and confiding;
Sorrow, who can speak thy grace?
Earth may name thee Tribulation,
Heaven has nobler apellation;
Not thus honored all our race.

8. Brethren, these our perturbations,
Step by step, through many stations,
Lead disciples to their Sun.
Soon—though many a pang has wasted,
Soon—though many a death been tasted,
Sorrow's watch of sighs is done.

9. Though the healthful powers were willing,
All the Master's will fulfilling,
By obedience to be tried,
O 'tis still no less a blessing,
Such a Master's care possessing,
In his furnace to abide.

10. In the depth of keenest anguish,
More and more the heart shall languish
After Jesus, loving heart,
For one blessing only crying:
"Make me like thee in thy dying,
Then thy endless life impart!"

11. Till at length, with sighs all breaking,
Through each bond its passage taking,
Lo! the vail is rent in twain!
Who remembers now earth's treasure!
What a sea of godlike pleasure
High in heaven swells amain!

12. Now with Jesus ever reigning
Where the ransomed homes are gaining,
Bathing in the endless light,
All the heavenly ones are meeting;
Brothers—sisters—let us, greeting,
Claim them ours, by kindred right.

13. Jesus! toward that hight of heaven
May a prospect clear be given,
Till the parting hour shall come.
Then, from pangs emerging brightly,
May we all be wafted lightly
By angelic convoy home!

KINDNESS.

This word seldom begins an article in a newspaper, but "cruelty," or "murder," more often instead. It is a pleasure to record an act of kindness; painful that we have not frequent opportunities. Yet such an act made our heart glad, filled it with a new love for our kind, only a day or two since. A school-girl, about ten years of age, was passing, with a smaller school-girl in her arms, whom she carried with much difficulty, for the weather was sultry. Other children were in company, with books in their hands. The whole party stopped to rest under the shade of a tree. Just then a gentleman observed the group. His attention was particularly attracted by the child, still supported by the arm of her friend. "What's the matter, my little Miss?" he inquired in his kind, soft tone. "She's sick, sir," replied the friend. "And are you taking her home?" "I'm trying, sir." "How far off does she live?" "Down by the Long Bridge." "A mile or more! and you would carry her through the hot sun! no shade on the way, either?" "I must try, sir," answered the school-girl. "No, you must not," said the kind gentleman, "it would kill both of you." A carriage passed at this moment. A word and a waving arm caused it to draw up to the pavement. All the party entered it, and all right merry, except the sick one, but even she looked up with a faint smile, fixing her large tender eyes on the face of the stranger. The driver had been instructed fully as to his designation, had been paid, too, and now drove away. "Poor little girl!" said the gentleman, to himself, in a low voice. "Good bye, sir!" said all the children, in a high tone. [Washington News.

PATIENCE.

Let me set before you, in one view, the incomparable excellencies and advantages of this lovely grace of patience. Patience, then, commends us to God, and keeps us his. Patience is the guardian of faith, the preserver of peace, the cherisher of love, the teacher of humanity; patience governs the flesh, strengthens the spirit, sweetens the temper, stifles anger, extinguishes envy, subdues pride; she bridles the tongue, restrains the hand tramples upon temptation, endures persecutions, consummates martyrdom. Patience produces unity in the Church, loyalty in the State, harmony in families and societies; she comforts the poor, and moderates the rich; she makes us humble in prosperity, cheerful in adversity, unmoved by calumny and reproach, she teaches us to forgive those who have injured us, and to be the first in asking forgiveness of those whom we have injured; she delights the faithful, she invites the unbelieving; she adorns the woman, and approves the man; is loved in a child, praised in a young man; she is beautiful in either sex, and every age. Behold her appearance and her attire. Her countenance is calm and serene as the face of heaven, unspotted by the shadow of the cloud, and no wrinkle of grief or anger is seen in her forehead. Her eyes are as the eyes of a dove for meekness, and on her eyebrows sits its cheerfulness and joy. Her mouth is lovely in silence; her complexion and color that of innocence and security; while like the virgin, the daughter of Zion, she shakes her head at the adversary, despising and laughing him to scorn. She is clothed in the robes of the martyrs, and in her hand she holds a sceptre in the form of a cross. She rides not in the whirlwind and stormy tempest of passion, but her throne is the humble and contrite heart, and her kingdom is the kingdom of peace. [Bishop Horne.

AFFECTION.

We sometimes meet with men who seem to think that any indulgence in an affectionate feeling is a weakness. They will return from a journey, and greet their families with the cold and lofty splendor of an iceberg, surrounded by its broken fragments. There is hardly a more unnatural sight on earth, than one of those families without a heart. A father had better extinguish a boy's eyes, than take away his heart. Who that has experienced the joys of friendship, and values sympathy and affection, would not rather lose all that is beautiful in nature's scenery, than be robbed of the hidden treasure of his heart? Cherish, then, your heart's best affections. Indulge in the warm, gushing emotions of filial, parental, and fraternal love. Think it not a weakness. God is love. Love God, everybody, and everything that is lovely. Teach your children to love; to love the rose, the robin; to love their parents; to love their God. Let it be the studied object of their domestic culture to give them warm hearts, ardent affections. Bind your whole family together by these strong cords. You can not make them too strong. Religion is love; love to God, love to man.

ORIGIN OF THANKSGIVING DAY.

When New England was first planted, the settlers met with many difficulties and hardships, as is necessarily the case when a civilized people attempt to establish themselves in a wilderness country. Being piously disposed, they sought relief from Heaven, by laying their wants and distresses before the Lord in frequent set days of fasting and prayer. Constant meditation, and discourse on the subject of their difficulties, kept their minds gloomy and discontented, and, like the children of Israel, there were many disposed to return to the land which persecution had determined them to abandon.

At length, when it was proposed in the assembly to proclaim another fast, a farmer of plain sense, rose, and remarked, that the inconveniences they suffered, and concerning which they had so often wearied Heaven with their complaints, were not so great as might have been expected, and were diminishing every day as the colony strengthened; that the earth began to reward their labors, and to furnish liberally for their sustenance; that the seas and rivers were full of fish, the air sweet, the climate wholesome; above all, they were in the full enjoyment of liberty, civil and religious. He therefore thought, that reflecting and conversing on these subjects would be more comfortable, as tending to make them more contented with their situation; and that it would be more becoming the gratitude they owed to the Divine Being, if, instead of a fast, they should proclaim a thanksgiving. His advice was taken; and, from that day to this, they have in every year observed circumstances of public happiness sufficient to furnish employment for a thanksgiving day.

IMPORTUNITY IN PRAYER.

Importunity in prayer is a combination of gracious affections working in the heart and flowing out to God in fervent desire for the blessing. There is an infinite difference between pertinent expression, and importunate desire. Many address God in such language as awaken the affections of others, while their own hearts are cold and frozen. Those only, who are experimentally acquainted with importunity can form any proper idea of it; and even those can not express what they feel. The Scriptures give various descriptions of importunity in prayer, both to open up the nature of it, and make the tried saint know that others have been reduced to equal extremity. It is called a wrestling with God, and refusing to let him go without a blessing; a stirring up ourselves to take hold of him, and giving him no rest; never holding our peace, day nor night, and not keeping silence; and pouring out the heart and laying it before God.

It is often exemplified: Jacob wrestled, Moses cried, and David roared and made a noise. Christ himself was most fervent and importunate "in the days of his flesh, when he offered up prayers and supplications with strong crying and tears unto him that was able to save him from death." It is altogether opposed to cold, languid desires, and heart-wandering. The soul collects herself, brings every faculty into action, and with united energy makes fervent supplication to God. With the eye of the mind fixed on the blessing, the importunate believer strongly desires it; his hope is filled with expectation, and faith urges the Divine promise. The affections unite with the other faculties of the soul, and all that is within the believer is stirred up to seek the Lord. [Gurnall.

HOW TO JUDGE OF THE INDUSTRY OF MINISTERS.—A farmer is apt to suppose, if he does not see his minister at work in the field every day, he must be idle, or lazy. A mechanic wants to see him in the shop. The merchant, in the store. The professional man thinks he might be attending to some profession. But none of these are his appropriate work. Judge him on the Sabbath. If he comes with his mind well stored with Divine truth, and is prepared to present to the people well arranged, well digested sermons from Sabbath to Sabbath—sermons that are calculated to interest and edify the church and the congregation; don't charge that man with being idle or lazy, he is at his work when you are asleep. HUMILITY OF JOHN FOSTER.

Foster judged himself severely by the gospel standard, and ever wrote bitter things against himself. We read no writer in English literature so thoroughly pervaded with a religious spirit. To him chiefly the world is indebted for the overthrow of that scoffing and skeptical spirit which was prominent in the literary circles of England in the early part of the present century. He met it bodily and crushed it with merciless logic and withering sarcasm. But the noble services rendered to the cause of evangelical religion never awakened any emotion of complacency. The following extract from a letter written towards the close of his long life, is a true index of the feelings of his soul.

"On my already long life I look back with little complacency (except as to the goodness of Divine Providence,) rather, with heavy condemnation. Comparatively with what it might and should have been, it has been an indolent and profitless life—of extremely slight intellectual discipline, very defective cultivation and advance of personal piety, and little faithful exertion to do good—a most powerful antidote to all pharisaism; from which, indeed, I do think I am wholly clear—and strange if I were not. But for that blessed refuge in the atonement of our Mediator I should be in utter despair. But, that, heaven be blessed, is all sufficient and alone."

ONE OF GOLDSMITH'S BLUNDERS.—Lord Clare and the Duke of Northumberland had houses next to each other (in Bath,) of similar architecture. Returning home one morning from an early walk, Goldsmith, in one of his frequent fits of absence, mistook the house, and walked up into the Duke's dining-room, where he and the Duchess were about to sit down. Goldsmith, still supposing himself in the house of Lord Clare, and that they were visitors, made them an easy salutation, being acquainted with them, and threw himself on the sofa, in the lounging manner of a man perfectly at home. The Duke and Duchess soon perceived his mistake, and while they smiled internally, endeavored, with the considerateness of well-bred people, to prevent any awkward embarrassment. They accordingly chatted sociably with him about matters in Bath, until, breakfast being served, they invited him to partake. The truth at once flashed upon poor heedless Goldsmith; he started up from his free-and-easy position, made a profound apology for his blunder, and would have retired perfectly disconcerted, had not the Duke and Duchess treated the whole as a lucky occurrence to throw him in their way, and exacting a promise from him to dine with them.

RESPECT FOR PARENTS.—If children could realize but a small portion of the anxiety their parents feel on their account, they would pay far greater respect to the paternal wishes. A good child, and one in whom confidence can be placed, is the one who does not allow himself to disobey his parents, nor do anything when his parents are absent that he has any reason to believe they would disapprove were they present. The good advice of parents is often so engraved on the heart of a child, that after years of toil and care do not affect it; and in the hour of temptation, the thought of a parent, has been the salvation of the child, though the parent may be sleeping in the grave, and the ocean may roll between that sacred spot and the tempted. A small token of parental affection borne about the person, especially a parent's likeness, would frequently prove a talisman for good. A Polish prince was accustomed to carry the picture of his father always in his bosom; and upon any particular occasion he would look at it and say, "Let me do nothing unbecoming so excellent a father." Such respect for a father or mother is one of the best traits in the character of a son or a daughter. "Honor thy father and thy mother, that it may be well with thee, is the first command with promise," says the sacred Book, and happy is the child that acts accordingly.

A BEAUTIFUL ILLUSTRATION.—A florist will tell you that if you paint the flowerpot that contains a favorite, beautiful, flagrant flower, the plant will wither, and perhaps its blossom will die. You shut out the air and moisture from passing through the roots, and your paint itself is poisonous. Just so, mere external cultivation, superficial, worldly accomplishment, or a too exclusive anxiety and regard for that, injures the soul. The vase may be ever so beautifully ornamented, but if you deny the water of life to the flower, it must die. And there are kinds of ornamental accomplishments, the very process of which is as deleterious to the soul, as the paint upon the flowerpot is pernicious to the plant, whose delicate leaves not only inhale a poisonous atmosphere during your very process of rendering the exterior more tasteful, but the whole earth is dried and devoid of nourishment. Nature never paints, but all her forms of loveliness are a growth, a native character, possession and development from the beginning. If the sun can never be called a painter, it is only because the plants absorb his rays, and receive them into the very texture and life of their vegetation. So, whatever is real knowledge, wisdom, principle, character, and life in education, is a process of the absorption and development of truth—is not mere painting. [Cheever.

The world is apt to blame too much the unsuccessful, while it censures by far too little the vile and unjust.

IS THE DECALOGUE DONE AWAY?

From a correspondent in Michigan we have received the following:—

In the year 1831 I made a profession of religion, and joined a Baptist church connected with the Haldemond Association, Canada West. In two or three years from that time, I was appointed to superintend a Sunday School, and took a great interest in it. For three years I discharged the duties of that office to the best of my ability, teaching and exhorting all under my charge to keep holy the first day of the week, and I firmly believed that that day was the Sabbath. That belief was not the result of my own investigation, but was rather an opinion derived from my parents and instructors. My mind remained undisturbed upon the subject till I removed to this place. Here, being in a Sunday School, and instructing the children from a question book, (as the manner then was,) the question was asked, "What is the fourth commandment?" and, after the command was repeated, the question (from the book) was then asked, "Is not that command still binding?"—to which the school answered that it was. But, to the astonishment of some present, I said that it was not; for I saw that if it was, I was a transgressor. From that time I began to investigate the subject for myself, which investigation has constrained me to come out and observe the Sabbath of the Lord our God.

My wife and two others in the neighborhood are with me; and several others have confessed that the seventh day is the only Sabbath by divine appointment. Yet they do not embrace it, and thus show their faith by their works.

The people here, or many of them, see that the claims of the seventh day must stand or fall with the Moral Law, and, therefore, some deny the obligation of the Law altogether; others, excluding the fourth commandment from the Decalogue, acknowledge the remaining nine.

For myself, I think the Decalogue was given to us to obey, not as a means of justification, but as a standard or criterion of moral good and evil; no less now, than in the days of Aaron and Moses; as the Apostle says, "By the Law is the knowledge of sin."

I should be pleased to see in your paper some remarks on 2 Cor., 3d chapter, showing distinctly the nature of the two ministrations there spoken of; and why the administering the Decalogue by the priesthood of Aaron is called the ministration of death or of condemnation; and also that the administering the same Law under the restrictions of the New Testament, is called the ministration of the Spirit; the former, the letter which killeth the latter, the Spirit which giveth life.

I am, dear sir, your affectionate brother in the truth,

ERASTUS CLARK.

Remarks.

Those who assume that there is no Sabbath under the gospel, make the chapter referred to by our correspondent one of their strong-holds. Convinced that it affords them no defense, we shall attempt an examination of the Apostle's argument; and if it should not appear, that the law is not "made void through faith," it will be because of our want of skill in conducting the examination.

We must premise, that "testament" is not a proper translation of the Greek term diathêkê. It ought always to be translated covenant, as every scholar knows. Trusting to the correctness of the version, however, some have argued that as the testament, or will, which a man makes, renders null any former will, so the New Testament of Jesus Christ renders null and void the Old Testament. They maintain, that whatever of the Old Testament is not brought over, and incorporated in the New, has ceased to be of any obligation. But if instead of Testament we read Covenant, much of the plausibility of this argument will vanish.

The Apostle declares, that himself, and his fellow-laborers in the gospel, were "ministers of the New Covenant." They had been called to dispense those blessings, which were secured to believers of all nations in virtue of that covenant, which was ratified by the shedding of Christ's blood. These blessings were transcendently greater than those secured to the Israelites by the Old Covenant.

"Not of the letter, but of the spirit." That is, "Not of the letter only;" the expression being elliptical, as in the following: "Christ sent me not to baptize;" that is, "not only to baptize." 1 Cor. 1: 17. The ministry of Moses consisted in enjoining upon the people the law, as it was written in "tables of stone." That law was certainly spiritual, as the Apostle testifies in another place. Rom. 7: 14; for it concerned not only the outward behavior, but also the thoughts and desires of the heart. Rom. 7: 7. Matt. 5: 22, 28. Ps. 119: 96. It enjoined love, and forbid covetousness. Therefore to obey it was to "walk after the Spirit." Rom. 8: 1. Nevertheless, to render obedience was not in the power of the natural man. It was necessary that he should have the Spirit of God to quicken him, and inwardly work in him, in order that he might render obedience. But as the Mosaic sacrifices were not sufficient to procure the influences of the Spirit, so the ministry of Moses consisted simply in enjoining the letter of the divine precepts, and then leaving the people to their own strength. He could say, (quoting the law,) "Thou shalt not covet;" but he could not accompany his words with a spiritual influence to destroy the covetous disposition of the heart. He could say, "Thou shalt not commit adultery;" but he could send no influence of the Spirit into the heart, to render it pure. He could say, "Thou shalt not kill;" but it was not in his power to allay by a divine operation the feeling of anger, the first budding of a murderous disposition. He could say, "Thou shalt have no other gods before me;" but if the heart of any one was secretly enticed after the abominations of idolatry, he could not impart the influences of the Spirit to destroy that desire. To enjoin the letter of the law—the matter of the duty—was all he could do. Therefore his ministration of the law was the "ministration of death;" because their violations in heart of its precepts rendered them as obnoxious to the curse, as if they had been guilty of open transgression.

Transcendently surpassing the ministry of Moses, is the ministry of Christ by his Apostles. When he speaks, a power goes with the word. He enjoins the precepts of the law—the very same precepts which Moses enjoined, namely, those "written and engraven in stones"—but he does not then leave his people to their own strength, to obey them or not, as they can. Otherwise his would be as much "the ministration of death" as was that of Moses. He accompanies these precepts with the influences of the Holy Spirit, which his own sacrifice has secured for them; so that they not only hear the precepts spoken, but have wrought in them, at the same time, a disposition to obey them. He says, "Thou shalt not covet;" and when he says it, he, by the power of his own spirit, writes it in the heart. The sinful desire is destroyed. The subject, upon whom he thus operates, no longer looks with covetous eye upon his neighbor's house, nor upon his neighbor's wife. He says, again, "Thou shalt have no other gods before me;" and not only is the heathen made to cast away his false gods, but the secret desire after them is subdued. He becomes well satisfied to take the God of Israel for his God, and begins to say, "I will love thee, O Lord, my strength." So Christ takes up every precept of the Moral Law, enjoins it upon his people, and, at the same time, sends that influence of the Spirit into their hearts which makes them render a willing obedience.

Is Christ's ministry, then, the ministry of death? Certainly not. For if his people are made obedient to the law, how can it slay them? It kills only the transgressor. Walking in conformity to the law—that law which is declared to be "spiritual." Rom. 7: 14. They do, therefore, "walk after the Spirit." Hence they are not under condemnation. Rom. 8: 1. And because the mediation of Christ secures that divine inworking of the Holy Ghost, which renders his people lovers of the law, and obedient to it, the gospel is called "the ministration of the Spirit."

But here it will be objected, that the obedience of the Christian is not perfect, and therefore not sufficient to justify him from the condemnation of the law; and that even if it were perfect, the condemnation of the law rests against him for the sins he committed before he became a believer.

We admit, that the Christian's obedience is not perfect; nevertheless, he is not a sinner such as he once was. Once he delighted in sin; now, if the strength of indwelling corruption draws him aside, it is a grief to him. Once he made no effort to mortify his sinful lusts; now it is his daily aim to put them to death, and to yield himself to God. And so long as it is a revealed fact, that the condemnation of the law does not lie against those who pursue this course, the interpretation we have offered will not be found to clash with the true Scripture doctrine of justification.

The objection about justification, however, is fully met by the passage under consideration. For the gospel is called, not only "the ministration of the Spirit," but "the ministration of righteousness," in opposition to that of Moses, which was "the ministration of condemnation." From the very fact that the Israelites did not keep the law, it condemned them. They could not, therefore, be justified by it. Neither can believers, who enjoy the inworking of the Holy Spirit, be justified by it. Their imperfect obedience cannot be accepted as the matter of their righteousness before God. The New Covenant, however, presents this advantage above the Old. It sets forth, in the death of Christ, an Atoning Sacrifice, with which God is so well pleased, that he reckons or imputes righteousness to those who rest upon it by faith. The Old Covenant provided no such sacrifice. It had its sacrifice, it is true; but they sanctified only to the purifying of the flesh. Heb. 9: 13. They could not make him that did the service perfect, as pertaining to the conscience. It was not possible for the blood of bulls and of goats to take away sins. All that those sacrifices could do, was to typify the great one to come. Therefore, when the Israelites were condemned by the law, they found in that Covenant no atonement to cover their guilt, no righteousness to justify them from their transgressions. On the other hand, believers find, in the New Covenant, blood which cleanses them from all sin; a righteousness, which justifies them from all things, from which they could not be justified by the law of Moses.

Now, in all this view, we can see nothing which indicates, that the law is not just as much a rule of duty to Christians, as it was to the Israelites. It is said, it is true, that some thing was "done away"—"abolished." But what is it that was "done away?" Not the law itself, but the Mosaic ministration of it. What that was, we have already seen. Moses enjoined it, without connecting with it any atonement sufficient to cancel the guilt of violating it, and without any holy spiritual influence sufficient to bring the people to a hearty obedience. It was, therefore, necessarily, "the ministration of death." It was death to the souls of the people; for it pronounced the curse of God against him that continued not in all things written in the book of the law, to do them. And to give the liveliest and most awful representation of this, the final doom of the sinner, capital punishment was inflicted without mercy upon the disobedient. Such a method of ministering the law is indeed "done away."

Let it be observed, that the Israelites had entered into a covenant—a solemn agreement—to keep this law. "All that the Lord hath spoken we will do." Ex. 19: 7 and 24: 3, 7. They had bound themselves either to keep the law, or to pay the penalty. But "they brake the covenant," (Jer. 31: 32,) and were continually giving proof, that by entering into it they had taken upon themselves a yoke which they were not able to bear. For fifteen hundred years their history affords one continued series of proofs, that they had involved themselves in a covenant which they could not keep. By that time the world was furnished with sufficient evidence, that it was not in the power of unrenewed man to justify himself by the deeds of the law, or to render any thing like a cordial obedience to it. Isaiah had been placed under the most favorable circumstances to do so, if the thing were possible. They were a vineyard in a very fruitful hill, fenced in, cleared from stones, planted with the choicest vine, furnished, in short, with every advantage. Isa. 5: 1—7. But the experiment was a failure. It was needless to try it with any other people. God, therefore, brings this covenant to an end. He will no longer enjoin the precepts of the law unaccompanied with an atoning sacrifice to cancel the guilt of violating it, and unaccompanied with the inworking of his Holy Spirit in the heart to bring about obedience. He will no longer set the mere letter of the law before his people, "written and engraven in stones," but he will "put it in their inward parts, and write it in their hearts." Jer. 31: 33.

Now it is very plain, that this abrogation of the Old Covenant was not the abrogation of the law itself. It was simply a release of the Israelites from the obligation, by which they had bound themselves in reference to that law. They had not only bound themselves to obey the law, but they had bound themselves under a curse. The abrogation of the covenant releases them simply from that curse. They are "redeemed," or bought off, from it by the blood of the New Covenant. Yet the law itself remains, as a rule of duty, in all its force; for believers are "not without law to God, but under the law to Christ." 1 Cor. 9: 21. To disregard the law is sin, (1 John 3: 4;) and the idea of sinning because we are under the grace of Christ, is repudiated as abhorrent to the gospel. Rom. 6: 1.

One thing must not be overlooked; that though the Israelites had bound themselves under a curse "to keep all the words written in the book of the law to do them," and though that rendered their salvation utterly hopeless, God, as the other party in the covenant, did not choose to leave them in such a miserable condition. He spoke of another covenant which he would make with them in days to come, (Jer. 31: 31,) and bound himself, and that with an oath, (see Heb. 6. 13—17, Acts 2: 30, Ps. 89: 35, and other places,) that he would raise up a deliverer in Zion to turn away the ungodliness of Jacob. Rom. 11: 26. And having thus bound himself, he directed them, through all the types and shadows of the law, to look to that deliverer for the salvation of their souls. Thus, while by the covenant the Israelites destroyed themselves, God provided mercy for them; showing, even under the darkness of that dispensation, that though he was a consuming fire to his enemies, he was, at the same time, "long-suffering and gracious, forgiving iniquity, transgression, and sin;" and illustrating the important fact, that while the sinner does nothing but work out his own destruction, his salvation is all of free and unmerited grace.

But as we have not space to say all we wish to on this great subject, we shall reserve the remainder for another occasion.

BRITISH CORRESPONDENCE—No. 17.

GLASGOW. October 11th, 1850.

The Queen returned last night from the Highlands to Edinburgh, on her way to London, amid demonstrations of loyalty and attachment to her person. During her abode at Balmoral, she attended the parish church in connection with the Established Church of Scotland—of which, by law, she is the Head. To the so-called High Church party in England, this has given dreadful offense. One of the organs of the party lately vented its spleen in no measured terms, at the danger to which her Majesty thus wantonly exposed herself in traveling without a chaplain having all the virtues of apostolical succession; and it is stated that the Bishop of London addressed to her a letter of remonstrance on the subject, and received for his pains the expression of the Queen's disapproval of his interference, and of her sense of duty in doing as she did. These Romanizers forget that the Presbyterians, though slighting dignified Bishops and Archbishops, boast as legitimately the Queen's supremacy in a certain sense, as the Episcopalians themselves.

The Evangelical Alliance met last week in Liverpool. The most remarkable circumstance that I have observed at their meetings was that of Sir Culling Eardley asking, this day week, "Whether it would be considered objectionable for brethren to submit to Government a proposition for a Sabbath stamp? He did not quite sympathize in the efforts that had been put forth for an entire cessation of all letter delivery on the Lord's day." The answer to, or discussion upon this question is not given in the paper from which I quote; but as the Alliance renewed their protest against Sunday work, it is to be presumed that Sir Culling found little favor. His proposal is indeed subversive of the principle which the Alliance seeks to maintain. They seek to have it believed that God has sanctified the first day of the week, and that, therefore, there should be no carrying of letters or postal delivery of them on that day. The proposal to carry or deliver only such as have a high-priced stamp affixed, might prevent many of the poor from Sunday correspondence, even when they considered themselves otherwise justified in the use of the post; and it would not deter the rich from availing themselves of the opportunity, even when they made no pretence to themselves or others, of justification on the plea of necessity or mercy. The Metropolitan Society, for promoting Sunday observance are preparing for another campaign—avowedly convinced that if their cause does not advance, it must retrograde. Indeed, they have already discovered that their late effort to shut all the Post Offices throughout the land, has resulted in an approach to a Metropolitan Delivery. They asked that all other towns should be conformed to the London model, and instead, they find that the provincial plan has been introduced into the suburbs of the city. There is now a Post Office delivery of letters and newspapers in Clapham, Paddington, Chelsea, &c., where formerly there was none; and with good reason it is expected that a more perfect uniformity will be established, unless by a great movement it can be prevented. That movement may, however, issue in their hastening what they seek altogether to prevent.

News from Rome intimates that the English Papist, Dr. Wiseman, who has for some time had the promise of a Cardinal's hat, has received it with the title of Archbishop of Westminster. The rest of their English dignitaries are also expected to be named Bishops of English sees, which hitherto has not been the case. Though designed for our heretical country, and residing amongst us, the dioceses of the Papal Anglecan bishops have had singular names of remote lands, if not as has been alledged, of places in the heart of Africa, or of countries scarcely better known. At the consistory which sends Westminster her apostate lordling, it is stated that of eighteen newly-made Cardinals, fourteen are from foreign States, and that only four are Italians. This seems somewhat remarkable. Can his Popedom be seeking to relieve himself from native bigotry by a large infusion of foreign blood?

Much interest has been excited here by the return of one of the vessels which had gone to the Arctic regions in search of Sir John Franklin's expedition. The commander, Captain Forsyth has brought with him from Cape Riley, near the mouth of the Wellington Channel, remains of pork, beef, canvas, and a piece of rope, found at a place which seemed to have been used as an encampment, and supposed to have been of a party belonging to the long-lost expedition. These remains Captain Forsyth has delivered to Government; and on a careful examination of the rope and canvas, it is believed, from peculiar marks, that they are remains of stores of the Terror, one of Franklin's vessels. When Captain Forsyth left, others of the searching expedition, which had previously seen the indications referred to, seemed pushing on in hope of success.

The Peace Congress made a bold attempt to give practical influence to their principles, by seeking to prevent the renewal of hostilities between the Danes and the Duchies of Holstein. A deputation, in interviews with the heads of the contending parties, sought to exhibit the sin and folly of war. The efficacy of their arguments was acknowledged by both; and then both went forth to prepare for the conflict, the renewal of which has already occasioned the loss of two or three thousand lives. Vain indeed is the hope the Congress indulges. I say not, therefore, the attempt to effect what is right should be abandoned. By all means let us testify against sin, and seek to encourage men to do what is right. But war is the result of indulged sin, against which mere reasoning, however convincing, gives not power. Men under the influence of sinful propensities, do what they know to be wrong. The grace of God felt in the heart alone prevents this. Christ having died to redeem us from our iniquities, He gives power to those who believe, to become the children of God; and those having in them the love of God, will have also that love to their neighbor which will seek his good, not his injury. A nation so influenced will be preserved from making agression on another nation—and thus would war be prevented by the true reception of the Gospel. The need of this heaven-born principle, I fear, many of our peace-men do not perceive; while they are ignorant of another of the revealed principles of Jehovah's government, which uses even the passions of men for his own righteous purposes. War is thus declared to be one of His "four sore judgments" whereby he punishes rebellious nations. While, therefore, men ignorant of the revelations of His word are dreaming of imparting happiness to apostate nations by means which bring not back the people to the love of God, that word denounces the dreadful outpouring of divine wrath on that apostacy, as the needful precursor and preparation for the godly peace that shall be enjoyed under the reign of the Redeemer.

I have been truly refreshed and encouraged by the account in the Recorder of the different meetings recently held of the representatives of the churches sanctifying the Sabbath in the United States. May they have great grace given unto them, to walk soberly, righteously, and godly in this present world, looking for that blessed hope, even the glorious appearing of the Great God our Saviour, to whom be all glory.

SUNDAY OF PAGAN ORIGIN.

It is often asked, Why is Sunday so generally observed if it be not right? and this is urged as an objection to the claims of the seventh day. In answer, we will briefly consider what evidence the history of the world furnishes of the origin and progress of the institution now so emphatically entitled "Lord's Day," or "CHRISTIAN SABBATH."

It is well known that the objects of worship among the earliest pagan nations, were the SEVEN PLANETS, and that each of these was supposed to exercise some divine influence over their respective days of the week. The Sun was the chief, and being adored especially on the first day of the week, this day was called after his name and became the chief of days. The next day was named after the Moon, and was called Monday, and so of the rest. Even the Jews, unto whom was committed the oracles of God, became seduced from their allegiance to them, also worshipped the Sun and Moon. 2 Kings 23: 5. The Greeks derived their notions from the eastern nations, the Egyptians and Phenicians, and the Romans followed the Greeks. With them Sunday became a more distinguished festival, as the Sun was a more conspicuous deity in their estimation. Thus, it is supposed, the great kingdoms which successively ruled the world, have in their time, consecrated this day of the week to the worship of a Pagan God, nor was it till the time of Constantine, that any abatement of Pagan regard was generally manifested. His conversion to Christianity was no doubt the occasion of its legal transfer to the character of a Christian Institution. Now, from the Scriptures, the obligation to keep holy the seventh day appears without dimunition from its first appointment at the close of the Creator's work. Even Pagan nations were not entirely ignorant of its claims. Hence, in the first centuries of the Christian Era, the seventh day was remembered by very many. But the animosity existing against the Jews by the Romans, from frequent quarrels between them or other causes, was in no wise diminished by the extension of Christianity in the Empire. As the Jews were the conservators of the Sabbath through the dark pages of the world's history, and as their zeal in its favor was only equal to their opposition to Christianity, enmity rose to the highest pitch against them among the Roman converts, insomuch that it was considered disgraceful to hold any thing in common with them. Under such circumstances it was not surprising that the venerable day of the Sun should retain sufficient regard in the Roman Empire to render it at least a formidable competitor for supremacy in the professedly Christian CHURCH OF ROME.

Christianity becoming greatly corrupted immediately after the death of the Apostles, its professors yielded to the weight of opposition against the Jews, and in many things conformed to the superstition of the Pagans, and according to Morer, "thought fit to keep the same day and the same name of it, that they might not appear causelessly peevish and by that means hinder the conversion of the Gentiles, and bring a greater prejudice than might be otherwise taken against the Gospel. Morer p. 22. The disgusting superstition of the Idolatrous world led some to question the propriety of such conformity, even in name, for some of the Gentiles believed that they had their souls from the Sun, their body from the Moon, their blood from Mars, wit from Mercury, good temper from Jupiter, from Venus pleasantness, and dulness from Saturn. Hence, Bacon was lead to remark, that Christians ERRED MUCH in not resting on Saturday after the manner of the Jews.

The propriety of adopting Pagan customs which were evidently inconsistent with the nature of the Christian religion, was from the first questioned, for St. Augustine, while he admits they kept the festival of the Sun, denies that they were idolaters for they worshiped that Sun which the Scripture calls the Sun of righteousness! Should we trace the history of the Sunday festival in the Church to find its origin, what better evidence could be desired to satisfy the incredulous, than the exact agreement in character of the Christian festival of Sunday, and the Pagan festival of the same name, and when we consider that both were entertained and fostered by the Roman State, that the one was merged into the other under the Imperial edicts, and amid the darkness of Pagan and Papal superstition, how can we doubt their common origin. Not so with the Sabbath; standing as it does a monument of the great work of creation—a memorial of that work which filled all space with the glorious display of GOD'S power, it points to the end of time, when the new heavens and the new earth shall supersede the present, and unfold the incomparable luster of a heavenly paradise. The Sabbath requires no change—admits no competitor to vie with its blessedness, or with it to divide the obligation of men to remember it and keep it holy.

LITERARY ASSOCIATION IN JERUSALEM.—A correspondent of the Christian Times, writing from Jerusalem, mentions that an association has been formed in that city for literary and scientific investigation of all subjects connected with the Holy Land; including history, languages, numismatic, statistics, manufactures, commerce, agriculture, natural history in all its branches, national customs, &c.; in short, every subject of curious research, except religious controversy. The members are all Protestant Christians, and residing within the Holy Land, by which designation is understood the territory between the Mediterranean and the Euphrates, and between the Nile and the Orontes. His lordship, the Anglican Bishop of Jerusalem, has accepted the office of patron, and some gentlmen of Damascus and Reyrout are corresponding members, as well as Dr. Kayat, her majesty's council in Jaffa. It is intended to publish yearly a volume of selections from the papers read at the weekly meetings, of which thirteen have already been held.

NEW YORK THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY.—President Hopkins, of Williams College, has been unanimously elected Professor of Theology in the Union Theological Seminary. The New York Observor remarks, that "the friends of theological education generally would rejoice to see Dr. Hopkins occupying the post to which he has been invited; but we presume there is little probability that he will leave Williams College. A correspondent at Williamstown, who, from his position, may be supposed to know whereof he affirms, writes, "The friends of Williams College need be under no apprehension that Dr. Hopkins will leave. It would be difficult to conceive how the Doctor could be more usefully and pleasantly employed than he is at present. The College was never in a more flourishing condition. More than sixty new students have entered since the commencement."

BISHOP ONDERDONK.—The principal interest attaching to the General Episcopal Convention at Cincinnati, was connected with the memorial before the House of Bishops, to restore Bishop Onderdonk. The question has been taken, and the request refused, by a majority of more than two to one. Considering that this is the concentrated effort of three years' managing, it would seem that the fate of the Bishop has reached its finality. The resignation of the Bishop may now be confidently expected. Indeed we have heard that it is already prepared and in the hands of a delegate, to be presented to the Convention, at the proper time. The House of Delegates at Cincinnati, have passed a canon providing for the election of an Assistant Bishop, where the Bishap of a Diocese is suspended, or otherwise disabled from service.

THE GOSPEL IN RUSSIA.—The Macedonian learns by a letter from Mr. Kemnitz, who writes from Templin, Russia, under date of May 13th, 1850, that the word of God is not bound within the field of his labors:—

"An earnest movement," says Mr. K., "a longing after the word of God, has recently been manifest, so that our places of meeting are too small to hold all who come, and the people therefore stand upon the floor of the house, even to the door. This hath God wrought, and it is marvelous in our eyes. The word of God has moreover proved its life-giving power on many a heart, so that on the 14th of April ten were baptized into the death of our Lord. Several strangers were present at the baptism, which was administered on a warm, pleasant moonlight evening. Fifteen places are calling upon us to come and hold meetings; but it is almost impossible for us to satisfy their desires."

NEW COLLEGE.—A company of benevolent individuals have recently purchased a lot of ground near Cleveland, Ohio, containing 275 acres, with a view of making it a site for a College, provided the means necessary to erect the buildings required can be raised. Prof. Asha Mahan has accepted the Presidency of the Institution, which is to be conducted upon the plan of Dr. Wayland, as regards allowing the students to select their own course of study. A young ladies' Seminary, under the charge of female Professors, is to be established in the vicinity of the College, in order to give the pupils in it the advantage of scientific lectures.

European News.

Since our last, the steamer Asia has arrived, bringing seven days' later news from Europe. The political news presents no new facts of much importance. On Monday, Oct. 7, Liverpool was visited by one of the most violent gales experienced for some time past. On Sunday, shortly before midnight, the wind commenced blowing rather fresh from the North west, accompanied at intervals with heavy rain. The wind increased until Monday morning, when it raged with great violence, amounting to a complete gale. As the tide rose, the River became much agitated. The billows broke against the piers on the Liverpool side with frightful violence. In the morning a schooner got aground on the North Bank. The crew were saved in the boat, and the vessel was afterwards taken in tow by a steam-tug and brought into the Birkenhead Dock. Another schooner went ashore on the High Bank, and a flat also got ashore near the same place. A sloop run ashore on the Welsh coast, where she was abandoned, and it is said the crew have not yet been heard of. On Tuesday, intelligence came in of several serious disasters. Another disaster was to the Arcturus, Lidstrom, from Ibrail to Liverpool, which was driven on shore at Crosby Point, where she became a perfect wreck. Several casualties occurred to the coasting steamers that were out when the gale set in. The storm was very severely felt at Belfast, and hailstones are said to have fallen there "as large as a boy's spinning top, and pointed in a similar manner." The Greek brig Alcibiades was lost off the port of Ayr, Ramsey, but the crew were saved. The storm had an extensive range. It was felt severely in London from W. S. W.; and it had such an influence on the tide in the Thames, that the vessels in the pool were left aground. Great damage was done to the works of the Harbor of Refuge, at Dover.

M. Poitevin made his ascent on Thursday from the Hippodrome, Paris, mounted on the back of an ostrich, amidst the cheers of an immense concourse of persons assembled. The balloon rose very majestically, and took an easterly direction. From the very little wind stirring at the time, it remained over the Batignolles for upwards of an hour.

The Schleswig-Holstein army attempted on the 5th to take Frederickstadt by storm, but were repulsed with a heavy loss, particularly in officers—estimated at 500 in all.

The erection of the building for the holding of the Fair of 1851, is going on rapidly. The tide of emigration still flows uninterruptedly from Ireland. The indications that Louis Napoleon will mount the throne, seems to increase. The Queen of Belgium died on the 11th. It is stated positively that Kossuth, and the other Hungarian exiles at Ketayha, have received permission to retire from the Ottoman territory, their term of detention having expired, and most of these distinguished individuals will at once proceed to the United States, where it appears they intend to settle. Accounts from Corfu of the 21st Sept., state that the Cholera still continued its ravages in Cephalonia. From the 12th to the 15th there were 64 cases and 23 deaths. The Potato Blight.—The Litchfield Enquirer says, "In this vicinity, and we believe throughout the country, the potato crop has suffered much more severely from the blight this season, than on any former year. Many farmers in this town, who anticipated a crop of three to four hundred bushels, have not enough to supply their own tables. Even those which seem to be fair and sound when dug, decay in a few days—and hence loads which have been carried into the cellar, apparently in good condition, have during the same week been carried out worthless. The value of this crop as an article of food, can scarcely be overestimated. Next to wheat it is the staple article of human sustenance. Indeed, it is demonstrated that an acre of potatoes will feed twice as many people as can be fed from an acre of wheat.

Late from Cuba—Arrest of Spies.—By the kindness of a friend, says the Boston Mail, we have been favored with the perusal of a letter from Cuba, concerning the late movements of the Spanish Government in that island, &c. It is dated, Matanzas, Isle of Cuba, Oct. 15, 1850, and says that on the evening of the 7th, and the morning of the 8th of the present month, fifteen persons, all Cubans, were arrested by the government and put in prison, charged with being spies and revolutionists; many, however, made their escape from the Island. The writer of the letter then goes on to recapitulate the names of those arrested, among whom we noticed that of Don Francisco de la O. Garcia, Don Saturnio Hernandez, and others of the most influential and wealthy men on the Island. Among those who escaped was Col. Francisco Hernandez Morejon, an officer in the National Army, and his brother Don Pedro. It is said that these men who are arrested are some of the most wealthy and influential persons in Cuba, and though they have been taken up only on the mere supposition of being spies, the whole country around, including even the soldiers and officers of the army itself are dissatisfied, and dark mutterings are frequently heard. By the intervention of some officer of the government one or two of the gentlemen were released, and managed to leave the Island. The principal officers of the grand army, and even some of the government emissaries, it is said, disapprove of the course thus taken, and would perhaps on the first opportunity resist the government in so doing. The writer of the letter, we are informed, is a person of much influence and rank in the Island, and is personally acquainted with the gentlemen apprehended as well as with all the different movements contemplated among the liberty-loving Cubans. We should not at all wonder if something was on foot once more to start a new revolution for the establishment of republicanism in that Island.

A Fugitive Escaped.—The Chicago Democrat says: On Tuesday a fugitive was "put through by daylight" for Canada, under the following circumstances, which are too good to be lost. A slave escaped a few days since from one of the back counties of Missouri and came to this State. His pursuers, hearing that he was in Quincy, Ill., passed over to that city, taking with them another slave who was to identify the runaway, and whom they hired from his owner at so much per diem, giving a guarantee that they would return him "in as good order and condition" as when received. At Quincy they were informed that the runaway had taken the underground track for Chicago; and forthwith they proceeded to this city, bringing their man who was to identify the fugitive along with them. Here, however, they received the unkindest cut of all. In the first place, they learned that the man they were after was not here and never had been; in the next place, the colored people got their heads together, gave the negro they brought with them for identification purposes a hint as to how "things was working," and on Tuesday evening they shipped him off by rail to Canada, where by this time he is safely set down beyond the reach of his pursuers; they, poor fellows, decamped for the South the same evening, their departure being hastened by a threat of "tar and feathers" from the excited colored population, who are up in arms, and nightly, as well as daily, on the watch for the white gentlemen with sallow complexions and broad brim hats.

The Gold Mines of California.—A mineralogist and geologist of much experience, who has been a practical miner for a year past in California, contributes an article to the "Placer Times," published at Sacramento City, on the prospective resources of the placers. He remarks, that he has found gold in the northern mines more plentifully distributed than he ever found any other metal in any other country, and gives it as his confident opinion, that the untouched and staple foundations of the wealth of the new State will be discovered in those deposits where the renumeration of an individual laborer will average four or five dollars a day. He also ventures to assert, what he supposes to be thought very absurd, that ten years from this date, there will be more gold taken from the placers and mines of California than they are yielding at this time, for the reason that only the richer deposits are now worked. He adds:

"I have satisfied myself that one elevated tract of table land, containing probably not less than one hundred acres, would pay not less than three cents per bucket over the whole extent, from the surface to the bedrock."

From Texas.—We have advices from the City of Galveston to the 11th inst. Arrangements have been made to ship beeves extensively from Indianola to New Orleans. The citizens of Indianola, illumined their houses on receiving intelligence of the passage of the Pearce bill. Nineteen-twentieths of them are in favor of the proposition. The Civilian proposes to make a very novel use of the money to be received from the United States. It thinks that after paying off the debt of Texas three millions will remain. This sum is to be received in U. S. Bonds bearing five per cent. interest, which will yield a revenue of $150,000 per annum—more than sufficient to pay the whole expenses of the State Government. This would enable Texas to do what no other State has done—abolish all taxes.

Death of Rev. S. Snowden.—The Spiritual Philosopher says, We are pained to learn that this venerable and good man died suddenly some days ago. He was over 80 years old, and had been a minister in the M. E. church for 40 or 50 years. Having been once a slave, though nominally free for about 50 years, the poor old man sunk under the fear that he was about to be seized and carried back again to slavery, even in his old age. He was a very shrewd, and has long been quite popular as a minister in the sect to which he belonged.

Heavy Defalcation of a Cashier.—The Mechanics' and Manufacturers' Bank of Providence has been enjoined, and its affairs placed in the hands of a receiver. The cashier, Albert W. Snow, is said to be a defaulter to the amount of $70,000 or $80,000, and has been arrested and held to bail. The Providence Journal says:—

"The capital of the Bank is $187,150, and the personal property of the stockholders is liable for its debts. We understand that it is the opinion of the Commissioners that the public will not eventually lose anything by the Bank. There is a "Mechanics' Bank" in this city, and a "Manufacturers' Bank," both in high credit. This is the "Mechanics and Manufacturers' Bank."

Insanity of one of the Hutchinson Family.—The Syracuse Standard of the 22d, verifies the report of the insanity of one of the Hutchinson Family. It says:

Judson Hutchinson, one of the members of the "Hutchinson Family," arrived in this city from the west, on Friday, in a state of insanity, induced by an attack of brain fever, at Cleveland, Ohio. He remained at the residence of Rev. S. J. May until yesterday morning, when he left for the east, in company with the remainder of the "family," who returned from the west with him. His condition is very unsatisfactory, and it is the design of his friends to take him to the Insane Asylum at Worcester, in hopes of affecting a cure. It is said that the fever which produced this terrible malady, was caused by the operation of mesmerism. Insanity, however, is hereditary in the family.

Failure of the Pawtucket Bank.—The visit of the Bank Commissioners to this "Institution" disclosed a system of fraud on the part of the cashier, A. A. Tillinghast, which has been going on for about seven years. An injunction has accordingly been laid on the concern. The amount of his defalcation has not been ascertained, but it is supposed that his property, which has been made over to the Bank, to the amount of $20,000 will by no means cover it. He had the whole management of the Bank, and had loaned largely to his friends, without good security. Several failures in the village have happened in consequence of the explosion, which is a serious misfortune to the business of the place. Mr. Tillinghast was the oldest cashier in the Commonwealth, and had been highly respected up to the time of the discovery.

Staves Exported.—The number of staves for wine, liquor, and oil casks, annually exported from New York to foreign countries, the Journal of Commerce says, is enormous, amouniug, in the course of the season, to many millions—there being sometimes as many as 800,000 disposed of from Mr. Denniston's yards in Water street and in Brooklyn, and as large a quantity from Messrs. Herbeck and Co.'s of Brooklyn. The staves, which are mostly of white oak, are brought ready prepared, as to size and shape, from the forests of Ohio and the other Western states, and a number of barges are employed, at this season of the year, in the exclusive carriage of these goods, but a small portion of which are required by the coopers of New York.

Volcanic Eruptions.—An Oregon paper, dated March 21, gives the following account of volcanic eruptions in Oregon:—"We are informed by a gentleman that both the mounts (St. Helen and Baker) are sending forth volumes of smoke, giving undoubted evidence that their volcanic fires are not yet extinguished. The craters from which the smoke was issuing in St. Helen were two in number, and low down the north and northeast sides; while in Mount Baker, which is a perfect cone, the smoke was issuing in dense masses from the center of the summit. It is probable that these are the only living volcanoes in Oregon."

Prize Ham, How Cured.—At the recent Agricultural Fair in Montgomery county, a prize was awarded to Nathan White for the best ham. This gentleman's mode of curing is as follows:

The pork should be perfectly cold before being cut up. The hams should be salted with fine salt, with a portion of red pepper, and about a gill of molasses to each ham. Let them remain in salt five weeks, then hang them up and smoke with hickory wood for five or six weeks. About the first of April take them down and wet them with cold water, and let them be well rubbed with bleached ashes. Let them remain in bulk for several days, and then hang them in the loft again for use.

To make Cucumber Pickles.—Soak the cucumbers, three or four days old, insour cider, or two parts water and one of vinegar; then place them in a pickle jar; heat good cider vinegar scalding hot, with an ounce of alum to a gallon of vinegar, with any kind of spices, and in such quantities as suits the taste; pour it over the cucumbers while boiling hot; cover them tight, set them in a cool place. If the vinegar is right, they will keep till substituted. Pickles made this way are always crisp, the alum hardens the skin of the cucumber, so that it never turns soft. Those made in this way a year ago are in excellent condition now.

He is to receive a salary of $5000 a year, and to be relieved from all his present pecuniary liabilities.

In the Island of Goa, near Bombay, there is a singular vegetable, the "sorrowful tree," because it only flourishes at night. At sunset no flowers are to be seen, and yet, half an hour after, it is quite full of them. They yield a sweet smell; but the sun no sooner begins to shine on them, than some of them fall off, and others close up, and thus it continues flowering in the night during the whole year.

The Woonsocket [R. I.] Patriot says that several cotton mills in the valley of Quinebaugh, Conn., have shut down their gates, and that the proprietors of other factories are preparing to stop operations.

Miscellaneous.

The Cup of Cold Water.

BY T. S. ARTHUR.

Henry Green was a reformed man. He had been a most abandoned drunkard, and, in the years of his sad decadence, had shamefully wronged and abused his family. But in a lucid moment, he perceived, with startling distinctness, the precipice, upon the very brink of which he was standing, and started back therefrom.

For his suffering wife and children, the waste places became green again, and the desert blossomed as the rose. After a long, long night of weeping, the sun came forth, and his smile brought light and gladness to their spirits. The husband and father was a man once more, with the heart of a man. He turned no longer away from them in debasing self-indulgence, but toward them in thoughtful affection.

How quickly is perceived a change for the better in everything appertaining to the inebriate's family, when the head of it abandons his sin and folly, and returns to his affection and duty. All this change was apparent in the family of Henry Green. They had suffered even to the deprivation of every comfort; but of these one and another were now restored, until every part of their humble dwelling seemed to smile again. How happy they were!

And yet the wife of the reformed man often felt a deep sense of insecurity. She understood too well, that for her husband, temptation lurked at every point. How often did she await his return home, as evening approached, with trembling anxiety; and mark, while yet afar off, his steps, to see if they were firmly taken.

It was early in the fall of the year, when Henry Green took the pledge. Through the winter, he had worked industriously; and, as he could earn good wages, his income had given them, as just mentioned, very many comforts. He had not been much tempted of his old appetite during the cold weather, nor did he feel its return at the opening of spring. But, with the fervent heat of summer, the slumbering desire awoke.

Active bodily labor produced free perspiration. Frequent thirst was the consequence; and whenever this was felt, the thoughts of the reformed man dwelt upon the pleasure a cool glass of some mixed liquor would give. With an effort, and often with fear at his heart, would he thrust aside the alluring images drawn by his truant imagination. And yet, they would ever and anon return; and there were times when he was tempted almost beyond his strength.

Green was a carpenter. Early in the spring, a gentleman offered him a good contract for putting up two or three frame buildings, which he gladly accepted; and as the lot upon which his house stood was large, he erected a shop thereon.

More cheerfully and hopefully than ever did the reformed man now work. He saw a clearer light ahead. He would, ere long, recover all he had lost, and even get beyond the point of prosperity from which he had fallen.

Time wore on. Spring passed away, and the summer opened. July came in with intensely hot weather. Already had Henry Green felt the cravings of his awakened appetite, and it required strong efforts of self-denial to refrain from indulgence.

About eleven o'clock—it was a hotter day than usual—Green's thoughts were dwelling, as was now too often the case, upon the "refreshing glass," once so keenly enjoyed. A little way from his shop, though not in view was a tavern, the bar-room of which memory was picturing to the eyes of his mind with tempting distinctness. He had often been there in times past—often drank there until thought and feeling were lost. He saw, in imagination, the rows of alluring decanters, with their many colored liquors; he heard the cold ice as it rattled in the glasses; he almost felt the cooling beverage upon his lips. So absorbed at length did he become, that he paused in his work, and leaned over his bench, his eyes half-closed, like one in a dreamy reverie.

It was a moment upon which his future, for good or for evil, hung, trembling in an even balance that a hair might turn.

For as long a time as five minutes, did Henry Green stand leaning over his work-bench, a picture of the neighboring bar-room distinctly before his mind, while he was conscious of an intense thirst—that it seemed as if nothing but a glass of mixed and iced liquor could possibly assuage.

With a deeply drawn breath, he at length raised himself, and the struggle that was going on in his mind more than half decided in favor of self-indulgence.

"Papa!" spoke a low, familiar voice by his side.

Green started and turned suddenly.

A child not over four years old, stood by him—a fair child, with a countenance full of innocence and affection. She held a tin cup in both her little hands.

"Have a drink of cool water, papa!"

"Yes, dear," replied the father, in a low voice that was unsteady from the rush of a sudden emotion, and he caught the cup from the child's hands, and raising it to his lips, drank it eagerly.

Instantly the picture of the bar-room, with all its allurements, faded from the mind of Green. He was a man again, in the integrity of a firm purpose. His child, led to him by the hand of a good Providence, had saved him. The cup of cold water had fully assuaged the violence of his burning thirst; and he was no longer under temptation.

"Thank you, dear!" he murmured, as he lifted his child in his arms, and kissed her tenderly.

"Shall I bring you another cool drink after awhile?" asked the little one, as she pressed her father's cheeks with both her little hands.

"Did any one tell you to bring me the cup of water?" asked Mr. Green.

"No sir. But I thought you would like a cool drink," innocently replied the child.

"Yes, dear, bring me another drink after a while." Then kissing the little angel who had been the means of saving him when about to fall into temptation, he replaced her upon the ground, and once more turned to his work; and as he bent his body in labor, he mused thus:—

"I did not think of the water when I felt that intense desire for a glass of liquor—it did not seem to be what I wanted. But the cool draught sent me (by Heaven, I will say,) so opportunely, has quenched the morbid appetitite, and I feel it no longer. Water, pure, health-giving water, you are all I need to give entire strength to my good resolutions! When the old desire comes again, I will drown it in clear cold water. I feel safer now. There is a medicine for the inebriate's craven appetite, and it is—WATER. Freely will I use it! THANK GOD FOR WATER!"

Yes, water is the medicine that cures the sickly craving for strong drink. Let the reformed man keep this ever in his thoughts, and the moment he feels the old desire, drown it, as did Henry Green, in pure cold water. Let him do this, and he is safe. He should watch the beginning of thirst, and be quick to allay the uneasy sensation lest he fall unawares into danger.

Fulton's First Steam Voyage.

The following very interesting reminiscence is communicated by R. W. Haskins, for the Buffalo Commercial Advertiser:—

Some twenty years since I formed a traveling acquaintance, upon a steamboat on the Hudson River, with a gentleman who, on that occasion, related to me some incidents of the first voyage of Fulton to Albany in his steamboat Clermont, which I have never met with elsewhere. The gentleman's name I have lost; but I urged him at the time to publish what he related, which, however, so far as I know, he has never done.

I chanced, [said my narrator,] to be at Albany on business when Fulton arrived there in his unheard of craft, which every body felt so much interest in seeing. Being ready to leave, and hearing that this craft was to return to New York, I repaired on board and inquired for Fulton. I was referred to the cabin, and I there found a plain, gentlemanly man, wholly alone, and engaged in writing.

"Mr. Fulton, I presume?"

"Yes, sir."

"Do you return to New York with this boat?"

"We shall try to get back, sir."

"Can I have a passage down?"

"You can take your chance with us, sir."

I inquired the amount to be paid, and, after a moment's hesitation, a sum, I think six dollars, was named. The amount in coin I laid in his open hand, and with an eye fixed upon it, he remained so long motionless that I supposed there might be a miscount, and said to him, "Is that right, sir?" This roused him as from a kind of revery, and as he looked up at me, the big tear was brimming in his eye, and his voice faltered as he said: "Excuse me, sir; but memory was busy as I contemplated this, the first pecuniary reward I have ever received for all my exertions in adapting steam to navigation. I would gladly commemorate the occasion over a bottle of wine with you, but really I am too poor even for that just now; yet I trust we may meet again, when this will not be so."

Some four years after this, when the Clermont had been greatly improved, and two new boats made, making Fulton's fleet three boats regularly plying between New York and Albany, I took passage in one of these for the latter city.

The cabin, in that day was below; and as I walked its length, to and fro, I saw I was very closely observed by one I supposed a stranger. Soon, however, I recalled the features of Mr. Fulton; but without disclosing this, I continued my walk and awaited the result. At length, in passing his seat, our eyes met, when he sprung to his feet, and eagerly seizing my hand, exclaimed, "I knew it must be you, for your features have never escaped me; and although I am still far from rich, yet I may venture that bottle now." It was ordered; and, during its dicussion, Mr. Fulton ran rapidly but vividly over his experience of the world's coldness and of the hopes, fears, disappointments, and difficulties that were scattered through the whole career of discovery, up to the very point of his final, crowning triumph, at which he so fully felt he had at last arrived. And in reviewing all these, said he, "I have again and again recalled the occasion and the incident of our first interview at Albany; and never have I done so, without its renewing in my mind the vivid emotion it originally caused. That seemed, and still does seem, to me, the turning point in my destiny—the dividing lines between light and darkness, in my career upon earth; for it was the first actual recognition of my usefulness to my fellow-men."

Such, then, were the events coupled with the very dawn of steam navigation—a dawn so recent as to be still recollected by many—and such as Fulton there related them, were the early appreciations, by the world, of a discovery which has invaded all waters, causing a revolution in navigation which has almost literally brought the very ends of the earth in contact.

Longevity.

I will delineate to you the portrait of a man destined to long life. He has a proper and well-proportioned stature, without, however, being too tall. He is rather of the middle size, somewhat thick set. His complexion is not too florid; at any rate, too much ruddiness in youth is seldom a sign of longevity. His hair approaches rather to the fair than to the black; his skin is strong, but not rough. His head is not too big; he has large veins at the extremities, and his shoulders are rather round than flat. His neck is not too long; his belly does not project; and his hands are large, but not too deeply cleft. His foot is rather thick than long; and his legs are firm and round. He has a broad, arched chest, a strong voice, and the faculty of retaining his breath for a long time without difficulty. In general there is a complete harmony in all his parts. His senses are good, but not too delicate; his pulse is slow and regular. His stomach is excellent, his appetite good, and digestion easy. The joys of the table are to him of importance; they tune his minute serenity, and his soul partakes in the pleasure which they communicate. He does not eat merely for the sake of eating; but each meal is an hour of daily festivity, a kind of delight attended with this advantage, in regard to others, that it does not make him poorer but richer. He eats slowly, and has not too much thirst. Too great thirst is always a sign of rapid self-consumption. In general, he is serene, loquacious, active, susceptible of joy, love, and hope, but insensible to the impressions of hatred, anger, and avarice. His passions never become too violent or destructive. If he ever gives way to anger, he experiences rather a useful glow or warmth—an artificial and gentle fever, without an overflowing of the gall. He is fond also of employment, particularly calm meditations and agreeable speculations—is an optimist, a friend to Nature and domestic felicity—has no thirst after honors or riches, and banishes all thoughts of to-morrow.

Heroic Achievement.

The following affecting narrative, which appears in the Memoirs of Dr. Chalmers, recently published, will be read by many of our readers with much interest. The chief actor, it will be seen, was Mr. John Honey, father of the present respected minister of Inchture, and of J. M. Honey, Esq., writer, Perth.

"One fearful day, the intelligence circulated through St. Andrew, that a vessel had been driven on a sand bank in the bay to the eastward of the town. A crowd of sailors, citizens and students, soon collected upon the beach; for the vessel had been cast ashore but a few hundred yards from the houses, and she lay so near that, though the heavy air was darkened by the driving sleet, they could see, at intervals, the figures of the crew clinging to rope or spar, ere each breaker burst upon her side, and shrouded all in surfy mist and darkness. In a calm sea a few vigorous strokes would have carried a good swimmer to the vessel's side; but now the hardiest fisherman drew back, and dared not face the fearful surge. At last a student of divinity volunteered. Tying a rope round his waist, and struggling through the surf, he threw himself among the waves, forcing his slow way through the raging element; he was nearing the vessel's side, when his friends on shore, alarmed at the length of time and the slow rate of recent progress, began to pull him back. Seizing a knife, which he carried between his teeth, he cut the rope away, and reaching at last the stranded sloop drew a fresh one from her to the shore; but hungry, weak and wearied, after four day's foodless tossing through the tempest, not one of the crew had courage or strength to use it. He again rushed into the waves—he boarded the vessel—he took them man by man, and bore them to the land. Six men were rescued thus. His seventh charge was a boy, so helpless that twice was the hold let go, and twice had he to dive after him into the deep. Meanwhile, in breathless stillness, the crowd had watched each perilous passage, till the double figure was seen tossing landward through the spray. But when the deed was done, and the whole crew saved, a loud cheer of admiring triumph arose around the gallant youth. This chivalric action was performed by Mr. John Honey, one of Mr. Chalmers' early and cherished college friends, afterwards ordained as minister of Bendochy, in Perthshire. Though his great strength and courage bore him apparently untired through the efforts of that exhausting day, there was reason to believe that in saving the lives of others, he had sacrificed his own. The seeds of a deceitful malady were sown, which afterwards proved fatal. Mr. Chalmers was asked and consented to preach his funeral sermon on the 30th of October, 1814, the Sabbath after the funeral.

Management and Profit of Fowls.

Since the exhibition of fowls last November, there has been a great interest shown in regard to the different breeds of hens and their management. It is a subject of more or less interest to every reader of your paper. Most persons are trying to obtain the largest hens. I think that small hens are much more profitable as layers. They will lay more eggs than those of the large breeds, and they can be kept at half the expense of those that are extremely large. My object is to obtain the hens that will yield the most eggs according to the expense. I have purchased a pair of Poland Top-knots, from which to raise stock for the year. They weigh about seven pounds to the pair.

I will give you an account of my management the past winter. I kept twenty-five hens and a protector, of the native breed. My pullets that were hatched in April commenced laying in November, and those hatched in May began to lay in December. I have not kept an account of the number of eggs they laid during the winter. The first week in January they laid ninety-one eggs. In the first two weeks in February, they laid one hundred and ninety-two eggs. I sold the eggs at fifteen cents per dozen, and during the winter the cost of keeping the hens was only equal to two-fifths the value of the eggs.

I give my hens corn and cob meal every day, mixed in meal or hot water. I kept corn, barley and oats by them all the time; I also kept by them, ashes, lime and oyster shells. Raw meat was given to them every day; I kept all the egg shells during the summer and gave them to the hens in the winter. I kept my hens in a house twenty by fifteen feet, with a large window in the south side. I find no difficulty in making my hens lay in winter; most people fail, neglecting to supply animal food, as a substitute for the numerous insects which they devour in summer.

Hens should be let out a few hours every day when the ground is bare. The best layers should be selected as breeders, and the protector changed every year. Grain should be kept by the hens at all times during the year. The principal reason that some farmers find no profit in keeping hens is because they only half feed them; they therefore are always in mischief, scratching for food. When farmers plant corn, they should give their hens a good supply, and they will not scratch it up. If hens are well managed, they afford more net profit than any other stock. Young hens should always be kept over, as they will lay better in winter than old hens.

INDIVIDUAL RESPONSIBILITY.—Dr. Wayland, speaking of the Christians who were dispersed by the first persecution of the Church at Jerusalem, says, "This little band accomplished more for the conversion of the world than all the Christians of the present day united have done;" does any one ask why? "Because," says he, "every individual felt that the conversion of the world was the work to which he himself, and not an abstraction called the church, was responsible. Instead of relying on man for aid, every man looked directly up to God to forward the work. God was thus exalted, his power was confessed; and very soon, in a few years, the standard of the cross was carried to the remotest extreme of the then known world."

Effect of Rarefied Air.

From a recent volume entitled "Curiosities of Physical Geography," written by W. Wittich, we learn that snow mountains are rarely visited by travellers, except along those foot paths which lie across mountainous passes, and serve as the shortest lines of communication between places situated on different declivities at some distance below the snow line. Such persons are hasty pedestrians, and commonly do not pay much attention to the operations of Nature. But several of these worthy persons, who wish to make themselves acquainted with all the particular phenomena of the works of Nature, have not hesitated to ascend the highest summits as far as possible, to explore these regions which appear to be the abode of horror and desolation. They have not been diverted from their purpose, or terrified at the dangers which surrounded them among these enormous masses of snow and ice, on the edge of perpendicular precipices, and on the brink of yawning chasms many hundred feet in depth; nor have they they hastily withdrawn themselves from those unpleasant sensations to which their bodies were subjected by the exceedingly rarefied air which they respired at such a great elevation.

These sensations are not experienced in the vicinity of the snow line, but only where the elevation of the mountain is considerably above it. The most remarkable, is the feeling of exhaustion. When Lieut. Wood was on the Roof of the World at Pamia, he wished to ascertain the depth of the lake Sri-kol, and for that purpose tried to make an opening in the ice. He found that the slightest muscular exertion was attended with exhaustion. Half a dozen strokes with an axe brought the workmen to the ground; and though a few minutes' respite sufficed to restore the breath, anything like continued exertion was impossible. A run of fifty yards at full speed made the runner gasp for breath. Indeed this exercise produced a pain in the lungs and a general prostration of strength, which was not got rid of for many hours. The human voice was sensibly affected; conversation, especially if in a loud tone, could not be kept up without exhaustion, and the pulse throbbed at a frightful rate. Saussure, when on Mont Blanc, experienced the same effects, and besides, he and his party complained of dizziness and headache; they lost their appetite, but were tormented by an ardent thirst, which could only be allayed momentarily by cold water. A complete indifference respecting all worldly objects pervaded their minds. When Humboldt attempted to ascend Chimborazo, and had nearly attained its summit, he desisted on finding that drops of blood issued from under his nails and from his eyelids.

Errors in Cooking.

Dr. Drake, of Cincinnati, in a late treatise on the principal diseases of the interior valley of North America, gives the following enumetation of the vicious modes of cooking which prevail in the valley:—

1. With a mass of our population, bread of every kind is apt to be baked too soon after the flour or meal has been wetted—that is, before there has been sufficient maceration. But what is still worse, it is scarcely ever baked enough.

2. Biscuits, as they are called, are baked in close ovens, by which process the fat they contain is rendered empyreumetic and indigestible.

3. When the dough for leavened bread, by excess of panary fermentation, has been charged with acetic acid, that product is not in general neutralized by the carbonate of potash or soda, but the bread is eaten sour.

4. Pastry, instead of being flaky and tender, is often tough and hard, sometimes almost horny.

5. Meats are often baked and fried, instead of being roasted or boiled, whereby they become impregnated with empyreumatic oil, and not unfrequently charred on the outside. In general, they are overcooked.

6. Fresh meat, and especially poultry, are commonly cooked too soon after death.

7. Soup is often prepared from parts deficient in gelatine, and abounding in fat, which swims upon the surface, and is much more indigestible than the meat would have been, if eaten in the solid form.

8. Eggs are generally boiled so hard as to render them tough, and many are often fried in fat, to a still greater degree of induration. Fried bacon and eggs eaten with hot unleavened biscuit, containing lard, and then buttered, is a favorite breakfast in many parts of the valley.

9. Vegetables, abounding in fecula, such as potatoes, rice and pulse, are often boiled so little, that all the starch grains are not burst open; while those containing albumen, as cabbage, are boiled until that element is firmly coagulated and deposited in the structure of the leaf.

WOMAN'S ECONOMY.—Governor Barbour, of Virginia, in an address before an agricultural society, says:—"Let every man have the fortitude to look his affairs in the face, to keep an account of his debts and items of expenditure, no matter how long or black the list; if he don't look into it, his neighbors will—and more, let him show it to his wife, if he has one. If a prudent woman, it will be of service; if imprudent, it will do no harm; but there are few of the latter, and I cheerfully bear evidence to the care and economy of woman. When in a situation to observe, I can safely say, that I never knew a woman, left to the care of an embarrassed astate that did not extricate it, if it was possible."

SPONTANEOUS HEATING OF IRON.—Cast iron, when brought into the air after it had been for many years under salt water, has become red-hot. In 1836 some cannon balls were raised from the Mary Rose, which sunk in a naval engagement near the Isle of Wight in July, 1545, nearly three hundred years before. The balls all became hot on exposure to the air, and fell to pieces. The cast iron gratings after being long immersed in the porter vats of the large breweries of London, grow hot when the porter is drawn off, from a similar cause.

EASILY DISCOURAGED.—How easily are some persons discouraged! If they try some project for an hour without success, they fret, get angry, and give up. Such characters never did accomplish any thing worth naming, and never will. Hierland states that he was three days and a half on a single stanza, which he was endeavoring to translate—one word only was wanting, and that he could not supply. It is said that Gray was ten years in writing the "Elegy in a Country Church Yard." Yet you are discouraged in an hour! What can be accomplished in a few moments! Years of patient industry are often spent in projecting great works. Some men have employed their whole lives in important undertakings, and, when just completed, have died of old age. Imitate them, and never yield for a moment to discouragement.

THE "BITING" WHALE.—Capt. Cook, of the bark Parker Cook, gave the following more particular information to Capt. Gamaliel Smith, of the schr. Union, relative to the sperm whale which attacked his vessel. It was on the 22d of July, in latitude 36 50. The whale was a very large one, yielding one hundred and three barrels of oil. When first lanced, the whale stove and capsized the boat with his head, and the line caught the leg of the boat-steerer, John Hoxie, nearly severing the foot. While in the water, Hoxie took his knife from his pocket and cut the line. The waist boat picked up the crew. Finding the whale was very war-like, Capt. Cook prepared his bomb lances and gun, and in the meantime the whale attacked the bark and struck her on the stern, which penetrated the head of the whale to the depth of the stem. The shock was so great that it threw every one on board upon the deck, and started the false stem. The whale then went off about half a mile and run upon the vessel a second time, but with less force. Capt. Cook then attacked the whale in his boat, with his bomb lance, and fired three times, within eighty yards, the whale coming at him each time with his mouth open, and "showing fight" in the most desperate manner. The third lance caused him to spit blood, and he died soon after. When the whale was cut in, Capt. C. bore away for Fayal to land Mr. Hoxie. [Boston Advertiser.

THE BANK OF ENGLAND.—An American correspondent of the New York Independent, writing from London says:—"I have had access to the interior of the Bank of England, and seen how dumb iron rods connected with a shaft turned by steam power, tell how many bank notes are struck of in the room above; how a box of paper will not come out from its place itself, put there by machinery, till a similar box of notes are brought back to be deposited there, and in turn to be removed by mechanical force; and how light, unworthy coins, as if conscious of their sins, will tremble a moment on the balance, which too, is moved by steam, and leap off in an opposite direction from the good ones; and how the blind agencies of brute matter are elsewhere furnished with eyes to guard the treasures of the establishment. In some instances three men must move in company with their different keys, and thus keep mutual watch of each other, or else these treasures cannot be reached. The arrangements throughout are remarkably exact and complete. There are nine hundred employed in and about the bank. One room contained only £30,000,000 worth of property, and what might be deposited in the vault below, I cannot say. The building occupies an area of eight acres. It has a clock that indicates the time on sixteen dials placed in as many different offices, and striking both the hours and the quarters.

THINKING ALOUD—The following amusing anecdote is related of the Earl of Dudley, whose talents as a scholar, and great knowledge of foreign and international law, induced King George the Fourth to select him as Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs without his having ever been a prominent man in politics. He had a habit of thinking aloud, which often placed him in very unpleasant predicaments. On one occasion, being caught in in the rain, a gentleman offered to take him home in his carriage; and on their journey the Earl said to himself:—"I suppose I must ask this man to dinner with me." The gentleman sitting by the side of him, who knew the failing of his Lordship, said aloud, as if musing, "If Lord Dudley should give me an invitation to dinner, I'll see him hanged before I will except it." This speech restored the Earl to a consciousness of what he had uttered, and he was so pleased with the manner it had been met that he offered the gentleman the appointment of Secretary of Embassy, which was, however, refused.

INFLUENCE OF A SMILE.—It is related in the life of the celebrated mathematician, William Hutton, that a respectable looking country woman called upon him one day, anxious to speak with him. She told him, with an air of secrecy, that her husband behaved unkindly to her, and sought other company, frequently passing his evenings from home, which made her feel extremely unhappy; and knowing Mr. Hutton to be a wise man, she thought he might be able to tell her how she should manage to cure her husband. The case was a common one, and he thought he could prescribe for it without losing his reputation as a conjurer.

"The remedy is a simple one," said he, "but I have never known it to fail. Always treat your husband with a smile."

The woman expressed her thanks, dropped a courtesy and went. A few months afterwards she waited on Mr. Hutton with a couple of fine fowls, which she begged him to accept. She told him, while a tear of joy and gratitude glistened in her eye, that she had followed his advice, and her husband was cured. He no longer sought the company of others, but treated her with constant love and kindness.

MISDIRECTIONS OF THE COMPASS.—The immense loss which Great Britain sustains by shipwrecks, has induced inquiry into the causes, and it has been satisfactorily ascertained that in most cases it arises from the misdirections of the compass produced by the attractive power of the iron used in the construction of the vessels, as well as the funnels, tanks, and guns employed in men-of-war. A remedy, it is said, can only be obtained by direct experiment on board each ship, for the reason that the result varies in different cases. From carefully prepared statistics, it appears that the annual loss of Great Britain alone by shipwrecks, is over five hundred vessels. To remedy this, a compass observatory has been established, where every ship of the Royal Navy has its compass adjusted before proceeding upon a cruise. This arrangement as yet only applies to naval vessels, and has not been extended to the mercantile marine.

BOSTON.

Boston has been very appropriately styled the City of Notions—the Metropolis of New England—the Literary Emporium of the Western World—the Athens of America. It has charms for the peddlar of Yankee notions. It has a name closely connected with everything great and noble in the history of our country. It has been scathed by the blasts of religious intolerance and persecution. It is hallowed by a thousand memories and associations of struggles for political and religious freedom. It is a hot-bed of modern transcendental Unitarianism. It contains the grave of many a pious pilgrim, who believed in the divinity of Christ, and the reality of an outward, objective world. It has nearly one hundred churches, and almost as many sects, striving, "neck and neck, to see which will land the most souls in heaven;" yet it has done much to allay the strife of sect. Here the Puritan Pilgrims built their shrines, dedicated their temples, bowed, prayed, and praised. Here first glowed the fires of the Revolution. Its shrines and sepulchres—its public halls and silent retreats—all have a charm for a New England heart. Interest is connected with every spot; yet a few, from the thrilling events associated with them, are of peculiar interest.

Bunker Hill is one of these spots. Here, on the 17th of June, 1775, was fought one of the most bloody and one of the most important battles of the revolution. The loss of the British was about eleven hundred; that of the Americans, in killed, wounded, and taken prisoners, about four hundred and fifty. But slight portions of the redoubts and entrenchments, sheltering those engaged in that conflict, remain to mark the spot. The corner stone of the Bunker Hill Monument, commemorative of the event, was laid on the 17th of June, 1825, by General Lafayette. The monument was finished in 1842, and a celebration in honor of its completion took place on the 17th of June of the following year. Many heroes of the revolution were present, several of whom were there sixty-eight years before at the battle. Its hight is two hundred and twenty-one feet. It is ascended by two hundred and ninety-five steps. There are two cannons attached to the wall at the top of the monument, named the Hancock and Adams, with the following inscription on each of them:—

"Sacred to Liberty. This is one of the four cannons which constituted the whole train of field artillery, possessed by the British Colonies of North America, at the opening of the war on the 19th of April, 1775. This cannon and its fellow, belonging to a number of citizens of Boston, were used in many engagements during the war. The other two, the property of the Government of Massachusetts, were taken by the enemy. By order of the United States, in Congress assembled, May 19th, 1788." "These guns were used many years by the Ancient and Honorable Artillery; and by them the Adams was burst in firing a salute."

Standing at the top of the Monument, you have a fine and enchanting view of Boston, the bay, and adjacent country. Everything around gives you an impressive sense of the blessings for which the heroes of Bunker Hill fought, bled, and died. May that bravery, that love of freedom, that contempt of domineering aristocracy, which were characteristic of those who fell in that battle, long be possessed by those for whom they sacrificed their lives. May they resist as undauntedly the encroachments of arbitrary power as did the indomitable General Warren, one of the slain in the battle, who, when the British officers had threatened to take the life of any man that should dare to speak of the Boston massacre during its anniversary celebration, solicited the privilege of delivering the oration. When the time came, he made his entrance by a ladder at the pulpit window of the "Old South," while the aisles, stairs, and pulpit, were crowded with British soldiery. There, in the presence of friends, pale and trembling with fear, he, calm and collected amid glittering swords and bayonets, commenced his speech, ran rapidly over the past history of the Colonies, reviewed the wrongs inflicted by the mother country, asserted the rights of the colonists, depicted in vivid colors the horrors of the massacre—the melancholy walk of death—the murdered son weltering in his blood—the husband gasping on the ground—cautioned the orphan babes lest, while their streaming eyes are fixed upon the ghastly corpse, their feet slide on the stones bespattered with their father's brain! then exclaims, "We wildly stare about, and with amazement ask, Who spread this ruin around us? What wretch has dared deface the image of God? Has haughty France, or cruel Spain, sent forth the myrmidons? Has the grim savage rushed again from the far distant wilderness, or does some fiend, fierce from the depth of hell, with all the rancorous malice which the apostate damned can feel, twang her destructive bow, and hurl her deadly arrows at our breast? No, none of these—but, how astonishing! it is the hand of Britain that inflicts the wound." He concluded. A profound silence reigned. Not a bayonet moved—not a sword drawn— no attempt made to assassinate him!

Faneuil Hall, the "Cradle of Liberty," is another place rich with associations of the past. It was built by Peter Faneuil, and donated by him to Boston for a place to hold town meetings. It was commenced in 1740 and completed in 1742. In 1805, it was enlarged by adding forty feet to its width, and twenty-five to its hight. The structure of the Hall is simple and unique. It is without seats, save on the speakers' stand. On this are a few plain chairs and a cherry table or two. The railing about it is very plain, and of oak, or its imitation, and shows by bruises and scars, the rough usage through which it has passed. On the wall back of the speakers' stand, hang the portraits of Peter Faneuil, E Preble, R. T. Paine, Gen. H. Knox, John Hancock, Gen. Joseph Warren, J. Q. Adams, John Adams, Samuel Adams, and George Washington. Over in front an embossed eagle, like a guardian angel, spreads its wings over this Cradle of Liberty. In short, everything about the Hall seems to partake of the good old puritanic spirit of the immortal one hundred and one that landed from the May Flower on Plymouth rock. If an American feels the spirit of Liberty burning dimly upon the altar of his heart, it would do him good to perform a pilgrimage to this Hall. What reminiscences will here thrill his soul! Every niche, corner, and column, is sacred to freedom. Its very walls, ceiling, and floor, are all hallowed by scenes the remembrance of which is grateful to every American heart. Here met the Colonists to devise means for beating back the waves of oppression, that, rolling from their fatherland, surged threateningly against their rock-bound coast. Here has ascended, in "peril's night," the humble, fervent prayer for the nation's safety. Through this Hall has stalked with heavy tread the British mercenary. These walls have reverberated to the shouts of freemen, when peace and independence crowned their struggles. Here, from time to time, ever since, have freemen met and listened to stirring debates and thrilling appeals, passed spirited resolutions, consulted over the future welfare of our nation, devised means for the elevation of the rising generation, or wept over the fall of some statesman or public benefactor. Athens had its Pnyx, where assembled the Excclesia, while Demosthenes thundered against the Macedonian, until the universal cry [was—"Let us march against Philip. Let us fight for our liberties. Let us conquer him or die." Boston has its Cradle of Liberty, where James Otis, the "orator of intrepid passion," the "flame of fire," with eloquence, fervid, bold, rugged, witty, and impassioned, aroused the latent aspirations of the people for liberty, led them to "snuff the approach of tyranny in every tainted breeze," and fell upon the vassals of oppression, like that thunderbolt from heaven, which closed his own earthly career, and numbered him with the illustrious dead—where Samuel Adams, the plain, quiet, sagacious, patriotic old Puritan, with an oratory, simple, clear, grave, sound, placid, and firm, comporting well with his "tie wig, cocked hat, and red coat," guided and controlled those that stirred up the storm—where John Hancock, "dignified cavalier of liberty," often met with his "crew," over which he presided with energetic, gracious, and dignified complaisance—where Josiah Quincy, "orator of refined enthusiasm," in language, bold, poetic, pathetic, vehement, and vindictive, was wont to arouse the people as when he exclaims, "Oh, my countrymen! if we have any respect for things sacred, any regard to the dearest treasure on earth; if we have one tender sentiment for posterity; if we would not be despised by the world; let us, in the most open, solemn manner, and with determined fortitude, swear, we will die, if we cannot live freemen!"—where John Adams, "orator of blended sobriety and enthusiasm," often stirred the hearts of his countrymen with the "point, pith, and pathos" of an eloquence inspired by that spirit which led him to declare, "Sink or swim, live or die, survive or perish, with my country is my unalterable determination," and at whose death, these columns and arches were shrouded, for the first time, in badges of mourning, as it was announced that "Adams and Jefferson are no more! on our fiftieth anniversary, the great national jubilee, in the midst of echoing and re-echoing voices of thanksgiving, while their own names were on all tongues, they took their flight togethor to the world of spirits"—where, too, John Quincy Adams, the "old man eloquent," presided for the first time over a meeting of the citizens of Boston, to consult on the wrong done by the British to American seamen, and where, forty years later, he presided for the last time over the same citizens, when a meeting was called to "talk a certain matter over in a plain way, and look in one another's faces," (a man had been kidnapped in Boston, kidnapped at noon-day, on the high road between Faneuil Hall and old Quincy, and carried off to be a slave!")—where also reposed awhile his mortal remains on their way to their final resting place, from the National Capitol, where he fell fighting at his post, exclaiming as he fell, "This is the last of earth! I am content." These and many more once engaged in the spirit-stirring scenes of this Hall, have run the race of life, leaving behind their names enshrined in the hearts of a free people.

In fine, everything about Boston, even its short, narrow, winding, contorted, yet clean streets, and irregular broken blocks of houses, bears an impress of the spirit of its founders. Whether you stand within the Cradle of Liberty, or look from Bunker Hill, whether you wander through the Common or amid the solemn shades of Mount Auburn, you feel a kind of puritanic air—a patriotic spirit—a religious inspiration, surrounding and enveloping you at every step. Boston is the political, artistic, and literary Athens—the moral and religious Jerusalem of America.

DONALD AND THE CATHOLIC NOBLEMAN.

A Scotch Nobleman, of the Roman Catholic persuasion, lived a very retired life, and left his affairs very much in the hands of others. One of his tenants named Donald, rented a farm upon which his forefathers had lived about two hundred years. The lease by which he held was on the point of expiring, and the steward refused to allow Donald a renewal, wishing to give it to a friend of his own. Poor Donald tried every argument in his power with the steward; but in vain. At length he determined to make his case known to his lordship himself; but at the castle he was repulsed, the steward having given orders that he should not be admitted.

Donald, almost in despair, resolved on a bold measure. He climbed over the garden wall, and entered a private door, made his way unobserved towards the apartment of the nobleman. As he drew near he heard his lordship's voice engaged in prayer; and waiting till he should conclude, distinctly heard him pleading earnestly with the Virgin Mary and St. Francis to intercede with the Father and Son in his behalf.

After the voice ceased Donald gently knocked at the door, was admitted, and made his case known to the nobleman, who, greatly moved by his tale, assured him that his lease should be renewed, and himself and family protected from the resentment of the steward. Donald poured forth his earnest and artless thanks, and was about to take leave, when a feeling of anxiety for the generous nobleman took possession of him thus:—

"My Lord, I have been a bold man, but you have forgiven me, and saved me and my family from ruin; I would again be a bold man, and say something farther, if I have your permission."

"Well, Donald, speak out," said the nobleman.

"My Lord," replied Donald, "as I stood waiting at your door I heard you praying with great earnestness to the Virgin Mary and St. Francis; you seemed to be very unhappy. Now, my Lord, forgive me, but I cannot help thinking that the Virgin Mary and St. Francis will do you but little good. I had been a ruined man if I had trusted to your servants; but I came direct to your lordship, and you heard me. Now if you would but leave the Virgin Mary and St. Francis, who I am convinced will do no more for you than your steward would for me, and just go direct to the Lord Jesus himself and pray to him for what you need, he will hear you and grant the desires of your heart; for he has said in his word, 'Him that cometh to me I will in no wise cast out.'"

ANECDOTE OF DR. MASON.

BY LAURIE TODD.

There lived in Newark, in 1802, a gentleman named William Ballard. For many months he carried about in his soul and body an awful impression of Divine wrath; he went to every church and assembly in the neighborhood; he found "no rest for his heart, nor peace for his soul," [I give his own words,] from anxiety about the one thing needful. His secular affairs were neglected.

Thinking that change of place and pursuits might tend to his peace of mind, he removed to New York. He visited most of the churches, prayer-meetings, and most of the solemn assemblies in the city; still the terrors of the law were around him. One Sunday, as the bell rang for afternoon service, he went forth, intending to enter the Middle Dutch Church. Passing from Broadway through Cedar street, he observed a crowd passing into a house of prayer. Previous to this he had never seen the building; he neither knew the name of the church nor the name of the preacher. He entered the porch and sat down near the door. He had never seen Dr. Mason, but he thought there was an unusual solemnity in his first prayer, and a familiar mode of expression, when addressing his Maker, as of a man speaking face to face with his friend. The text was, "Oh wretched man that I am! who shall deliver me from the body of this death." The words from the lips of the living preacher, fell like soothing oil on the stormy ocean in his troubled breast; every word spoke peace; his heart was opened to receive the truth, the scales fell from his eyes, and he wondered in himself, "Why have I been so long blind?" He went on his way rejoicing. He joined himself to the church on the next sacramental occasion, about a month thereafter; when, having stated the circumstances above narrated, Dr. Mason remarked. Said he, "On that afternoon I entered the pulpit prepared to speak from another text. During the singing of the Psalm before prayer, on reflecting, I could neither remember the subject nor the text. After prayer, while the congregation sang, I was yet undecided. In the anguish of my spirit I inwardly exclaimed, 'O wretched man that I am!' An inward monitor suggested what better text? You know the sequel."

From Dicken's Household Words.

THE HOUSEHOLD JEWELS.

A traveler, from journeying
In countries far away,
Repassed his threshold at the close
Of one calm Sabbath day;
A voice of love, a comely face,
A kiss of chaste delight,
Were the first things to welcome him
On that blessed Sabbath night.

He stretched his limbs upon the hearth,
Before its friendly blaze,
And conjured up mixed memories
Of gay and gloomy days;
And felt that none of gentle soul,
However far he roam,
Can e'r forego, can e'er forget,
The quiet joys of home.

"Bring me my children!" cried the sire,
With eager, earnest tone;
"I long to press them, and to mark
How lovely they have grown;
Twelve weary months have passed away
Since I went o'er the sea,
To feel how sad and lone I was Without my babes and thee."

"Refresh thee, as 'tis needful," said
The fair and faithful wife,
The while her pensive features paled,
And stirred with inward strife;
"Refresh thee, husband of my heart,
I ask it as a boon;
Our children are reposing, love;
Thou shalt behold them soon."

She spread the meal, she filled the cup,
She pressed him to partake;
He sat down blithely at the board,
And all for her sweet sake;
But when the frugal feast was done,
The thankful prayer preferred,
Again affection's fountain flowed;
Again its voice was heard.

"Bring me my children, darling wife,
I'm in an ardent mood;
My soul lacks purer aliment,
I long for other food;
Bring forth my children to my gaze,
Or ere I rage or weep,
I yearn to kiss their happy eyes
Before the hour of sleep."

"I have a question yet to ask;
Be patient, husband dear.
A stranger, one auspicious morn,
Did send some jewels here;
Until to take them from my care,
But yesterday he came,
And I restored them with a sigh:
—Dost thou approve or blame?"

I marvel much, sweet wife, that thou
Shouldst breathe such words to me;
Restore to man, resign to God,
Whate'er is lent to thee;
Restore it with a willing heart,
Be grateful for the trust;
Whate'er may tempt or try us, wife,
Let us be ever just."

She took him by the passive hand,
And up the moonlit stair,
She led him to their bridal bed,
With mute and mournful air;
She turned the cover down, and there,
In grave-like garments dressed,
Lay the twin children of their love,
In death's serenest rest.

"These were the jewels lent to me,
Which God has deigned to own;
The precious caskets still remain,
But, ah, the gems are flown;
But thou didst teach me to resign
What God alone can claim;
He giveth and he takes away,
Blest be His holy name!"

The father gazed upon his babes,
The mother drooped apart,
While all the woman's sorrow gushed
From her o'erburdened heart;
And with the striving of her grief,
Which wrung the tears she shed,
Were mingled low and loving words
To the unconscious dead.

When the sad sire had looked his fill,
He veiled each breathless face,
And down in self-abasement bowed;
For comfort and for grace;
With the deep eloquence of woe,
Poured forth his secret soul,
Rose up, and stood erect and calm,
In spirit healed and whole.

"Restrain thy tears, poor wife," he said,
"I learn this lesson still,
God gives, and God can take away,
Blest be His holy will!
Blest are my children, for they live
From sin and sorrow free,
And I am not all joyless, wife,
With faith, hope, love, and thee."

EFFICACY OF PRAYER.

We are said to be living in an age of mere expediency—of material progress—of social derangement—of everything except faith. To this assertion there is at least one curious contradiction in the existence of the Ashley Down Orphan House in Somersetshire; a brief account of which, as we have received it, will probably be interesting to our readers. In that county there has lately sprung up a new religious sect, known by the inconvenient and undeclinable name of Craik-and-Mullerites, whose prime article of belief is, the power of prayer. Whatever they require, these people simply demand it of God; and, as they alledge, it is bestowed on them. The text, "Ask, and it shall be given unto you," they adopt in its literal sense—and with a result which is marvelous if a tithe of what they assert can be accepted in their own literal spirit. The sect of the waiters on Providence is likely to spread if they can establish their premises.

Not to mention other matters, some time ago, Herr Muller and his followers took it upon their consciences to build a magnificent Orphan House. Their design was beneficent, the institution was greatly needed in the district, but instead of adopting the ordinary machinery of charity, by appeals to the rich and benevolent, they simply fell on their knees and appealed to Heaven. The responses came in from every corner of England, from many cities on the Continent and in America, and in every variety of form. From one contributor came a penny—from another a boot-jack—from a third an ancient coin. The farmer forwarded a cart of manure—the merchant a hogshead of sugar—the landowner the produce of the sale of a tree cut down for the purpose. Women sent in their golden trinkets—men their clothes. Tables, chairs, sacks of flour, flitches of bacon, sides of beef, beds, tooth-picks, coats, hats, shoes, wash-hand-stands, and so forth, came pouring in. The money contributions were halfpence, shillings, pounds—the latter in hundreds and in thousands. All these things came, it is said, as the levies of faith. What is certain is—the building is there on Ashley Down. In arrangement, proportion, completeness of design, and detail, it is one of the noblest fabrics in the country. It is already occupied by three hundred children—and the same means by which it was erected in the first instance, and is now maintained, are about to be employed for its further enlargement.

No one is personally applied to for a farthing; the whole is left to the secret influences of the spirit. Yet, according to Herr Muller's statements, strangers, whom he has never seen, to whom he has not made known his case, have given him for his orphans not less than 33,868*l.* 11*s.* 1¼*d.* in answer to his secret prayers. These are strange facts to record among the materials for the history of the times. Mormonites and Mullerites in the midst of railways, penny postage, and half-penny steamboats! Pointing to the noble edifice, the founder says,—"It grew by prayer; story after story, wing after wing, added themselves in answer to prayers offered on bended knees." The mystery which envelopes the affair should not, however, blind us to the manifest inconveniences of such a creed and practice in weak hands. The thirty odd thousand pounds is only part—the orphan's part—of the wealth forwarded to Herr Muller in answer to his celestial supplications; and the fact that the new apostle seems to have hitherto used his dangerous power with discretion, may be an uncertain guarantee for his future moderation, or that of his successors. If the spell of Herr Muller's conjuration be as strong as he calls it, the world is very inconveniently at his mercy. [London Athenæum.

ANECDOTES OF DR. CHALMERS.

Some curious anecdotes of Dr. Chalmers are given in the new volume of his life, now on the point of publication. Immediately upon his translation to Glasgow, a most enthusiastic attachment sprung up between Chalmers, who was then some thirty-five years of age, and Thomas Smith, the son of his publisher, a young man still in his minority. It was more like a first love than friendship. The friends met regularly by appointment, or in case of absence, daily letters were interchanged. The young man died in the course of a few months. A ring containing his hair was given to Chalmers; and it is noted as a singular fact, showing the intense and lasting nature of his attachment, that the ring, after having been long laid aside, was resumed and worn by him a few months before his death, a period of more than thirty years. . . . His keen practical talents did not altogether shield him from attempts at imposition. "On one occasion," he writes, "a porter half drunk came up to me, and stated that two men were wanting to see me. He carried me to a tavern, where it turned out that there was a wager between these two men whether this said porter was correct in his knowledge of me. I was so revolted at his impertinency, that I made the ears of all who were in the house ring with a reproof well said and strong; and so left them a little astounded, I have no doubt." . . . On another occasion, while busily engaged one forenoon in his study, he was interrupted by the entrance of a visitor. The doctor began to look grave at the interruption; but was propitiated by his visitor telling him that he called under great distress of mind. "Sit down, sir; be good enough to be seated," said the doctor, looking up eagerly, and turning full of interest from his writing table. The visitor explained to him that he was troubled with doubts about the divine origin of the Christian religion; and being kindly questioned as to what these were, he gave among others what is said in the Bible about Melchisedec being without father and without mother, &c. Patiently and anxiously Dr. Chalmers sought to clear away each successive difficulty as it was stated. Expressing himself as if greatly relieved in mind, and imagining that he had gained his end—"Doctor," said the visitor, "I am in great want of a little money at present, and perhaps you could help me in that way." At once the object of his visit was seen. A perfect tornado of indignation burst upon the deceiver, driving him in very quick retreat from the study to the street door, these words escaping among others—"Not a penny, sir! not a penny! It's too bad! it's too bad! and to haul in your hypocrisy upon the shoulders of Melchisedek! . . . . A discussion arose among the superintendents of his Sunday Schools whether punishment should ever be resorted to. One of them related an instance of a boy whom he had found so restless, idle, and mischievous, that he was on the point of expelling him, when the thought occurred to him to give the boy an office. The candles used in the school-room were accordingly put under the care of the boy; and from that hour he became a diligent scholar. Another superintendent then related his experience. He had been requested to take charge of a school that had become so unruly and unmanageable that it had beaten off every teacher that had gone to it. "I went," said the teacher, "and told the boys, whom I found all assembled, that I had heard a very bad account of them, that I had come out for the purpose of doing them good, that I must have peace and attention, that I would submit to no disturbance, and that, in the first place, we must begin with prayer. They all stood up, and I commenced, and certainly did not forget the injunction—Watch and pray. I had not proceeded two sentences, when one little fellow gave his neighbor a tremendous dig in the side; I instantly stepped forward and gave him a sound cuff on the side of his head. I never spoke a word, but stepped back, concluded the prayer, taught for a month, and never had a more orderly school." Dr. Chalmers enjoyed the discussion exceedingly; and decided that the question as to punishment and non-punishment stood just where it was before, "inasmuch as it had been found that the judicious appointment of a candle-snuffer-general and a good cuff on the lug had been about equally efficacious." . . . Among the most ardent admirers of the doctor's eloquence, was Mr. Young, professor of Greek. Upon one occasion, he was so electrified that he leaped up from his seat upon the bench near the pulpit, and stood, breathless and motionless, gazing at the preacher till the burst was over, the tears all the while came rolling down his cheeks. Upon another occasion, forgetful of time and place—fancying himself perhaps in the theater—he rose and made a loud clapping of his hands in an ecstacy of admiration and delight. . . . . He was no exception to the saying that a prophet is not without honor save among his own countrymen. When he preached in London, his own brother James never went to hear him. One day, at the coffee-house which he frequented, the brother was asked by some one who was ignorant of the relationship, if he had heard this wonderful countryman and namesake of his, "Yes," said James, somewhat drily, "I have heard him." "And what did you think of him?" "Very little indeed," was the reply. "Dear me," exclaimed the inquirer, "when did you hear him?" "About half an hour after he was born," was the cool answer of the brother. . . . . When he preached at his native place, so strong was the feeling of his father against attending any but his own parish church, or so feeble was his desire to hear his son, that, although the churches of the two parishes of Eastern and Western Anstruther stood but a few hundred yards apart, the old man would not cross the separating burn in order to hear him.

THE LOST BROTHER FOUND.

An American missionary, after a residence of several years in Syria, returned to visit his friends. His parents had gone to their long home, but his brothers still survived, of whom one was hopefully converted soon after his arrival; but another was in the far West, a gentleman of princely fortune and of high rank, but without God and without hope in the world. He resolved to visit him, and on his arrival at his habitation, was welcomed with great fraternal tenderness.

"But," says the missionary, "I found my brother as I had anticipated, averse to religious conversation, especially when it assumed a personal character. Day after day passed, and I begun to fear lest I should be constrained to return to my foreign field, without having any religious interview with him. But on the evening previous to my departure from his dwelling, after his family had retired, and when we were alone, I spoke of our departed mother, sang some of the hymns which she taught us, and repeated passage after passage from the Catechism. The tears streaming from his eyes assured me that I had at length found an open door to his heart. He inquired, 'Where is the old Primer? I would give more for a copy of it than for any book in my library.' I drew from my pocket," continues the missionary, "the only one in my possession; and while we wept together, I presented it to him, saying, 'Take that, dear brother, and God grant that it may revive our mother's faith in your heart!' We bade each other good night and retired. Early in the morning I left his abode, expecting to see his face no more in this world. It was not many days before I received a letter from him, informing me of his hopeful conversion, which he ascribed instrumentally to his recollection of his mother's instruction, awakened by that little book." "Cast thy bread upon the waters; for thou shalt find it after many days."

RECIPROCAL SYMPATHY.

Half a century ago, when a coach ran daily between Glasgow and Greenock, by Paisley, on a forenoon while a little past Bishopton, a lady in a coach noticed a little boy walking barefooted, seemingly tired, and struggling with tender feet. She desired the coachman to take him up, give him a seat, and she would pay for it. When they arrived at the inn in Greenock, she inquired of the boy what was his object in coming there. He said he wished to be a sailor, and hoped some of the captains would engage him. She gave him half a crown, wished him success, and charged him to behave well. Twenty years after this, the coachman returning from Glasgow in the afternoon, on the same road, when near Bishopton, a sea-captain observed an old lady on the road, walking very slow, fatigued and weary. He ordered the coachman to put her in the coach, as there was an empty seat, and he would pay for her. Immediately after, when changing horses at Bishopton, the passengers were sauntering about, except the captain and old lady who remained in the coach. The lady thanked him for his kindly feelings, as she was unable to pay for her seat. He said he had always sympathized with weary pedestrians, since he himself was in that state when a boy, twenty years ago near this very place; when a tender-hearted old lady ordered the coachman to take him up, and paid for his seat. "Well do I remember that incident," said she; "I am that lady, but my lot in life has changed: I was then independent; now I am reduced to poverty by the doings of a prodigal son." "How happy am I," said the captain, "that I have been successful in my enterprises, and am returning home to live on my fortune; and from this day I shall bind myself and heirs to supply you with 25 pounds per annum till your death." An Italian artist who was engaged in painting a picture of the "Last Supper," invited some friends to examine and criticise it. A remark was made by one of them that the silver cups were most beautifully represented. He immediately took his brush and swept them out, saying that he would have nothing in the picture that would attract even a moment's attention from the face of the Saviour, which he designed to be the prominent figure of his work.

Could we all resolve to do as much good as is in our power, acting upon the resolution, what incalculable happiness might we diffuse for ourselves, what gladness might we diffuse over the existences of others!

The Sabbath Recorder.

New York, November 7, 1850.

Proclamation,

By Hamilton Fish, Governor of the State of N. Y.

The mercies of an all-kind Providence call for an acknowledgment of gratitude and of dependence from the creatures of his bounties.

The year which is about to close has been marked by innumerable blessings to us as a Nation. Abundant harvest and profitable labor have brought rich rewards to honest industry. Peace and tranquility are established at home; and no discord disturbs our relations abroad. Health, prosperity, and abundance, have been freely vouchsafed to us. Civil and religious liberty prevail throughout the length and breadth of the land. And to us all is secured the free exercise of the worship of their Creator according to their own faith. And on this occasion we should not forget, that while an inscrutable Providence has seen fit to remove during the past year the Chief Magistrate of our Union, that same Providence has preserved us under the trial a free and united People, has saved us from anarchy or civil commotion, and has continued to us the mild operation of a Government of our own adoption and rulers of our own choice.

I do, therefore, designate and recommend THURSDAY, the twelfth day of December next, to be observed by the good People of this State as a day of Public Thanksgiving to Almighty God.

In witness whereof I have hereunto subscribed my name and affixed the Privy Seal of the State, [L. S.] at the City of Albany, the 31st day of October, one thousand eight hundred and fifty.

By the Governor, HAMILTON FISH.

IS THE DECALOGUE DONE AWAY?

[Concluded from our last.]

The stone tablets, on which the Ten Commandments were written, being spoken of as "the tables of the covenant," (Heb. 9: 4,) some suppose that the Decalogue was the covenant which God made with the Israelites at Mount Sinai. Hence, as it is expressly taught that the covenant is done away, the conclusion is, that the Decalogue itself is no longer binding. We shall endeavor to set forth our own views in regard to this point, and leave the reader to judge for himself whether they are according to truth or not.

A covenant, being of the nature of a contract or agreement, supposes two parties, one of whom makes certain propositions, and the other accepts or rejects them at his pleasure. But in the Ten Commandments what propositions are made by one of the parties, and what agreement to, or acceptance of them, is there on the part of the other? These commandments, taken by themselves, appear simply as commandments, or as so much pure law enjoined by the Creator, which the hearers are not at liberty to reject. Without some superadded transaction, there is nothing that appears like a covenant. That which is wanted to give the Decalogue a covenant character, is the voluntary agreement of the people to keep all its precepts, or abide the penalty. This agreement we have in the express promise of the Israelites, "All that the Lord hath spoken we will do." Exod. 19: 8 and 24: 3, 7.

But suppose there had been no such agreement; suppose God, as one of the parties in the covenant, had not proposed to make the Israelites his peculiar treasure above all people, on condition of their keeping his covenant, (Exod. 19: 5;) and suppose the Israelites, on the other hand, had not promised obedience—would not the duties enjoined in the Decalogue have been binding upon them nevertheless? Most unquestionably they would, not as a covenant, but as law. And if the duties of the Decalogue would have bound them antecedently to any covenant obligation entered into to keep them, they would continue to bind them after such covenant obligation is done away. As law, or as an expression of the will of God with regard to his creatures, the Ten Commandments devolve upon us with moral obligation. Between moral and covenant obligation the distinction is clear. We do not contend for that covenant obligation to the Decalogue, by which the Israelites were bound, but for moral obligation. We maintain that Christianity does not dissolve, but greatly strengthen, moral obligation; and for this reason we hold, that Christians are still bound by the Decalogue as a rule of life.

But it ought not to be overlooked, that the covenant which God made with the Israelites contemplated a very important object, namely, the shadowing forth of a Redeemer to come. This was the great object for which they were set apart as a nation by themselves. It was to accomplish this object that they were furnished with that system known as the Levitical Law. This was the end of the priesthood, the sacrifices, the festal seasons, and all the temple service. And when this great object of the Old Covenant was accomplished by the coming of Christ in the flesh and dying for the sins of mankind, the Covenant was no longer needed. It decayed, it waxed old, it vanished away.

But what was the guaranty that the Israelites would faithfully perform their part towards shadowing forth the promised Redeemer? What security could they give, that they would observe the festivals, offer the sacrifices, and faithfully attend to all the routine of the temple service? Nothing less than a distinct and solemn recognition of the Moral Law as the great rule of right and wrong. The heathen nations had other standards by which to regulate their behavior. They were governed by expediency, self-interest, love of fame, and had so little sense of moral obligation, that when they made a solemn promise there was no security that they would keep it. They were preeminently covenant-breakers. But the Israelites must not be like them. They must, by their distinct recognition of the Moral Law as expressed in the Ten Commandments, give the best guaranty possible, that they will faithfully perform what they promise. No stronger guaranty could they give.

The Decalogue, therefore, becomes the basis or foundation upon which the covenant of God with the Israelites is made. And we add, that it must necessarily be the foundation of any other covenant. Jesus Christ, as our Redeemer, could not have entered into covenant with the Father to accomplish the salvation of his people upon any other principle. He must first recognize the law of God. Accordingly, when about to undertake the great work, he says, "Thy law is within my heart." Indeed, in all our covenant transactions with one another, we require the great principles of this law to be recognized. We are afraid of that man who will not recognize them. We are suspicious that he will not be true to his word.

But does it follow, because a covenant is done away, that this law upon which it is based is done away? By no means. The law remains as law, though all covenant contracts based upon it are brought to an end.

BRITISH CORRESPONDENCE—No. 18.

Sunday Movements—Roman Catholic Bishops for England—Mr. Gorham, &c.

Glasgow, October 18th, 1850.

A correspondent of this day's Scottish Guardian, in whose district Sunday postal delivery is the practice, had intimated at the local office, that he wished the delivery of his own letters on that day to be discontinued. This, he says, was, however, refused, and on communication with the head office of Edinburgh, the refusal was stated to be in accordance with the regulations. He has now a farther communication from the head office in London, intimating that the decision of the Edinburgh office was correct, but that the subject is under consideration. Such a decision will show how little has been gained by the recent agitation. I never doubted, that at any previous time persons might have succeeded, on written application to the local postmaster, in getting their letters and newspapers withheld over Sunday, or over any other day. Unless, therefore, I was mistaken in this opinion, the Sunday cause has gained a loss! But the annoyance in such a case would equally apply to a keeper of the true Sabbath. From the correspondence it does not appear what would be the result of the letters being refused at the door on Sunday; but I am thankful to be able to say, that hitherto letters addressed to me at my shop, have been delivered after the Sabbath is past.

On Sunday last a number of gentlemen, employees of the Board of Health, over which Board Lord Ashley presides, were engaged with instruments surveying Abbey Wood, on the North-Kent Railway—the ground being designed for a cemetery. It may have been done without the sanction or knowledge of his Lordship, but considering the prominent part he has taken in endeavoring to promote sanctification, it is not remarkable that the incident has been specially noticed in this connection.

The Sunday excursion trains from London have this year been largely patronized; and some of the provincial districts into which they have run complain of the consequences. There was a meeting held last week at Bath, with a view to their prevention. They resolved to petition the Great Western Railway Company on the subject. The favorable season is past for the present year; and the Directors may readily enough comply with a request which they may not deem it their interest to refuse. But the interest of shareholders, when excursion season returns, is likely to have fully more consideration.

A rather curious circumstance has occurred in connection with the town of Johnstone Prize Essays for Sunday Observance. It is stated in the church papers, that the first prize, paid in money, was awarded for an Essay which has been found to be a plagiarism, with scarcely any adaptation, from discourses of the Rev. Mr. Binne, minister of Lady Yester's church, Edinburgh, printed in the Christian Herald for 1836. The journals, in commenting upon the delinquency, are very indignant; but they do not enter upon the consideration of the temptation which, from the manner in which Essays have been solicited, and prizes bestowed, has been held out to unprincipled men. It is no doubt right that literary labor be remunerated; but in a question of morals and religion, a first question as to qualification surely ought to be the moral and religious character of those who presume to instruct.

Considerable apprehension appears to be entertained of the consequences of the Pope's recent transformation of the "Bishop of Melipotamies" into the "Archbishop of Westminster," and appointment of English Bishops. "The Times" has thundered on the subject, and the echo has been transmitted through various channels. But it seems more an indication of past progress of corruption than as actually imparting more power to Rome. It depends upon the country what recognition shall be given to Papal assumption. In the close approximations of Puseyism, as well as in the extensive increase of chapels throughout Scotland and England, (chiefly, if not exclusively, arising from Irish immigrants,) the wily head of an apostate church has drawn favorable omens, that he may advance the cause of declension by the step just taken. And in this calculation, I doubt not, he is correct. Some who love the pomps which Puseyism has re-introduced into the English church, and who seek for peace through the means which have been substituted for the blood of Christ, may prefer receiving both nearer their source than the streams which have flown from it. The simple Gospel of the grace of God having been departed from, and Tradition being preferred to Inspired Scripture, the tendency must be downward. Our security is in cleaving to the Lord, and holding fast his faithful word.

The Rev. Mr. Gorham is seriously ill at Bampford Speke, his medical advisers being in constant attendance upon him. The long and severe contest in which he was engaged with the Bishop of Exeter, has probably injured his constitution. He has, however, been the means of eliciting a judgment of which others are availing themselves. Several cases, it is stated, have occurred similar to his own, in which the enmity of the Bishop has been expressed; but, although for a time threatened with ecclesiastical displeasure, yet on their manifesting a design of contesting the point, the Bishop has succumbed. He may well dread the renewed expense of a similar prosecution, especially while there is no reason to expect greater favor.

The wire of telegraphic communication between England and France, which was severed immediately after its efficiency of action had been tested, is to be renewed in a form less liable to such an accident. All operations are at present suspended; but it is now proposed to have the wire, after it is enclosed in gutta percha, encased in thick wire cables capable of withstanding heavy anchors, and to have two such lines, at a distance of some miles from each other, either of which may be used in case of accident to the other. These cables and other apparatus are to be manufactured during the winter, and in spring to be submerged. The work is expected to be completed in May, when it will be opened with ceremony.

J. A. BEGG.

RESOLUTIONS,

Adopted at a meeting of the citizens of Alfred Center and vicinity, held at the Academy, Oct. 24th, 1850, for the purpose of expressing their sentiments on the present aspect of the Slavery Question in our national transactions.

1. Resolved, That we love Order, Peace, and Justice, and heartily detest Anarchy, Contention, Misrule, and especially Legislative and Executive Tyranny and Corruption.

2. Resolved, That any legislative and executive body, most emphatically ours, is legitimately amenable to its subjects, as well as to God, for its abuse of delegated powers.

3. Resolved, That, therefore, whenever any legislation, emanating from the law-making powers, is clearly subversive of the laws of God, and utterly repulsive to the nobler sentiments of humanity, it is made the imperious duty of the subject to raise his voice against it, and, if unheeded, to oppose its execution, even unto death.

4. Resolved, That the "Fugitive Slave Bill," passed by our Congress at its last session, and approved by our President on the 18th day of Sept., 1850, exhibits, in its effects upon the African race, the common abominable phases of all slave codes—in taking away the right of trial by jury, it greatly endangers the safety of freemen, even of free white men—in specifying a discriminating price for trials, it attempts a vile corruption of the judiciary—in forbidding to feed, shelter, clothe, protect, and administer to any specific necessity of a fellow creature, it is shamefully unchristian—in paying the expenses of protection to slave-catchers, from the public revenues, it is beyond all precedented fraud—in the facilities and inducements held out for the purpose of inviting slave-catchers and kidnappers amongst us, it calls into our midst, and turns into our houses, a class of the most notorious banditti, and attempts to legalize their murderous depredations—in all its features, it not only transcends, but also violates, both the spirit and letter of our national Constitution.

5. Resolved, That a Legislative Act, so obnoxious to humanity, to all justice, to Christianity, and to our constutional guaranties, is a most shameful disgrace to, and a libel upon, our nation and age; and, that we will not only not passively submit to its requisitions, but will also resist its execution among us—will defy the power which would enforce it, calling upon the God of the oppressed—the God of justice—in this our extremity.

6. Resolved, That this Bill, and the Bill dismembering New Mexico and paying Texas $10,000,000, constitutes a series of the most flagrant acts of tyranny and corrupt legislation ever yet perpetrated by our government, a vile scandal upon our national character, and worthy the veriest tyrants and the darkest ages.

7. Resolved, That we deem every candidate for office under obligation to state, openly and candidly, to his constituents, his opinions on all such political questions pertaining to his prospective office, as they may see fit to interrogate him.

8. Resolved, That, therefore, we will not support any man for the next Presidency or Vice Presidency, nor for any State office whatsoever, unless he is under pledges to oppose all Legislation designed to perpetuate and extend human slavery.

9. Resolved, That we request the printing of these Resolutions in two or more of our County papers, in the Sabbath Recorder, New York Tribune, and National Era; and that a copy of them be sent to the President of the United States.

H. G. Greenman, Chairman.
Ira Sayles, Secretary.

To the Editors of the Sabbath Recorder:—

In accordance with the last of the above Resolutions, this copy is forwarded to you, in the hope that you will give the Resolutions a place in your paper, making such comments as may appear to you best. We are far from desiring to light the torch of civil strife, or to array ourselves against the civil authorities of the land; yet, when tyrants menace, and imbecile, time-serving politicians, who are the constituted guardians of our national liberties, tremble, falter, yield to unhallowed, unjust, and exorbitant demands, we hold firm, undaunted opposition, on the part of the people, to be a solemn duty imposed upon them by the obligations they owe to themselves as men, to their wives and their children, their mothers and their sisters, to the wronged, oppressed, crushed victims of an inhuman legislation, to their posterity, to their common nation, to those undaunted champions of justice who dared to stand firmly against the passage of so odious an Act as the "Fugitive," and, finally, by the obligation and allegiance they owe to God. Thus believing, we present the above Resolutions for the consideration of our neighbors, in like calamity with ourselves, for the consideration of the nation, and the Christian world; and, though we stand alone, we stand by them, or we fall by them; but, if we fall, our last words shall be an execration upon tyranny and corruption. Let no one think this a vain and idle threat. We have, in time past, through the providence of God, had the pleasure of extending that friendly aid needful to the timid, fleeing fugitive; and we pray God to send us more! They shall not want a roof to shelter their defenseless heads, or a bed whereon to rest their weary limbs, food to satisfy the cravings of hunger, clothes to warm their shivering flesh, sanative medicine for their gaping wounds or feeble bodies; nor, if they will receive it, light to the understanding, and the cheering hopes of the gospel of the "Lamb of God, who taketh away the sin of world," tyrannical interdictions to the contrary notwithstanding.

H. G. Greenman.
Ira Sayles.

ANOTHER VIEW OF THE FUGITIVE SLAVE LAW.

To the Editors of the Sabbath Recorder:—

Several communications have appeared in your paper of late on the subject of Slavery, and I think some of the writers were not properly under the guidance of the inspired advice, "Let your moderation be known to all men." When I read such language as the following, can I reasonably come to any other conclusion? Speaking of the Fugitive Slave Law, one writer says:—

"What freeman can call it a law, or give it any of the honors of law? It is not law. It cannot be law. Others may call it law but, God helping me, I never will. I despise it; yea more, I contemn it."

The law is also pronounced high-handed treason. I am myself an uncompromising enemy to slavery, and have been from my early days, perhaps as much so as any of your correspondents; but I have never felt myself authorized to assume the judgment seat, and pronounce the two Houses of Congress, the President, and Attorney-General, traitors, and their acts treason, for not doing what I might honestly suppose they ought to have done. I do not think such a state of things would be desirable. Suppose one third or one half of the freemen in the United States should believe that Congress and the President were traitors; the natural consequence would be to confine and punish them as traitors. I would ask if that would not "incite to deeds of bloodshed," and civil war?

I have not the vanity to suppose, that my individual movements will amount to much. I will, therefore, only ask for a little space to introduce the opinions of two or three individuals of high standing, both as jurists and expounders of the Constitution. Judge Grimkie, of Ohio, late of the Supreme Court, "a thoughtful, calm, dispassionate man," (so says the editor of the North American Review,) says:—

"The men of the South find themselves born under an institution which they had no hand in creating, which their fathers did not assist in building up, but vehemently protested against, when it was introduced by the mother country. Their course is plain—if it cannot be removed, to employ the same judgment and discretion in the management of it as is due to every other institution which is placed beyond their control. To have made slaves of men originally, was deep injustice. To introduce them into the society of whites, and leave them to contend with beings so much their superiors, is still more flagrant injustice. Even if there were not an incontestible distinction between the two races, still, if there is a total defect of sympathy, from causes which it is impossible to remove, all efforts to melt them into one people must fail. If, then, it is impossible to melt the two races into one; if to transport one of them is impracticable, and to emancipate it would be an act of injustice and inhumanity, there is but one alternative—to retain the institution of slavery. We are never masters of circumstances under which we were born. We may desire a change in every one of them. But the wise and inscrutable decrees of Providence have ordered otherwise, and we can in no way fall in with its designs so completely as by accommodating ourselves to difficulties which cannot be surmounted; in other words, by acting up to the rule of right, in every situation in which we may be placed, and this not merely where our duties are plain, but where they lead us over a dark and difficult way. To attempt to beat down an institution because we were not consulted as to its establishment, is to arrogate an authority which does not belong to us. But we may convert that institution into an instrument of good. We may apply to it the same rules of justice and humanity which are applicable to every other part of the economy of society."

Hon. Daniel Webster, in a letter to the Committee who requested his attendance at a meeting of the friends of union and peace at Castle Garden, New York, on Wednesday evening last, says:—

"The peace measures of the last session are, the Texan Boundary Act, the Act for establishing the two Territorial Governments of New Mexico and Utah, the Act for the Abolition of the Slave Trade in the District of Columbia, and the Fugitive Slave Law. This last measure, gentlemen, is not such a measure as I had prepared before I left the Senate, and which, of course, I should have supported, if I had remained in the Senate. But it received the proper sanction of the two Houses of Congress, and the President of the United States. It is the law of the land, and as such is to be respected and obeyed by all good citizens. I have heard no man whose opinion is worth regarding, deny its constitutionality, and those who counsel violent resistance to it, counsel that which, if it take place, is sure to lead to bloodshed, and to the commission of capital offenses. It remains to be seen how far the deluded and deluders will go on, in this career of faction, folly, and crime. There were honest and well meaning members of Congress, who did not see their way clear to support these great and leading measures of the last session. You are quite right in saying that the motives of these gentlemen ought not to be impeached. But the measures have been adopted, they have become laws, constitutionally and legally binding upon us all, and no man is likely to oppose them. No man is at liberty to set up, or affect to set up, his own conscience as above the law, in a matter which respects the rights of others, and the obligations, civil, social, and political, due to others from him. Such a pretense saps the foundation of all government, and is of itself a perfect absurdity; and while all are bound to yield obedience to the laws, wise and well-disposed citizens will forbear from renewing past agitation, and rekindling the flames of useless and dangerous controversey. If we would continue one people, we must acquiesce in the will of the majority, constitutionally expressed; and he who does not mean to do that, means to disturb the public peace, and to do what he can to overturn the Government."

Hon. Josiah Quincy, of Massachusetts, whose "moderation" and talents are "well known to all men," after a very candid discussion of the subject, says:—

"Let the laws upon this subject be so modified as to give every person whose service is thus claimed the right of trial by jury before being sent out of the land, and the universal dissatisfaction would be almost wholly allayed, and the southern owner, under the law so modified, will have no more obstacle to his success than what is inherent in the nature of such trial."

I fear I have already exceeded my limits, but would beg the indulgence of a line or two more, to enter my protest against holding out any inducements to the slaves to desert from the South, such as promising to divide the last loaf between him and our children, &c. Whatever may be our duty to them when they arrive here, I believe it is as wrong for me to hold out any inducements for them to leave their masters, as it would be to induce an apprentice to run away, or a marine to leave a war ship; not that their cases are exactly similar, but both are fraught with evils and breaches of law. If one has selected to be free, and finds his way to the North, and calls at my door and asks for bread or a fish, I would not give him a stone or a serpent, and I think I should not lend any aid to discover his whereabouts, nor assist in arresting him. And if I held an office that required me to do so, I think I should resign it, (unless it was a very fat one.) As to promises, I think I had better make none, as it is an old maxim, that he that is first to make is the first to break them.

GREENMANVILLE, CT.

Greenmanville, (Mystic Bridge P. O.,) Ct.,
Nov. 3, 1850.

To the Editors of the Sabbath Recorder:—

Spending a few days at this place, I am reminded of the changes which time has made in the condition of things near the scene of my boyhood sports. More than thirty years have passed. I well remember the countenance of a venerable man, bent with the severe toil of a ship-builder's life, who was accustomed to pass by my father's residence, in the pursuit of his avocation. Notwithstanding the difficulty of his task, he was a consistent Christian, and a Sabbath-keeper. Few men in New England had a more extensive acquaintance, and few men were more noted for industrious and enterprising habits. But he has passed to that "bourne whence no traveler returns." His sons, who now succeed him, inherit his character, and at this place have "built a city," devoted to their calling, and to the service of the God of their fathers. They stand prominently before the commercial community as the enterprising builders of some of the largest ships that traverse the ocean. One of them, at present a popular packet between New York and Liverpool, bears the name of their honored parent, "Silas Greenman." Another, still larger, now on the stocks, will soon add a new leaf to the volume of the fame of "Greenmanville." The three brethren, who by their united strength have done so much for the building of this place, are zealous supporters of the institutions of religion. A Sabbath-keeping church has already been formed in their midst, with more than forty members, and a neat and an appropriate house of worship is in progress of erection. A minister of the gospel is settled among them, and an interesting state of religious feeling is manifest. May the work of the Lord prosper in their hands, and success crown their labors of love.

Closet Concert of Prayer for Colleges.—A writer in the Vermont Chronicle urges the duty of closet prayer as essential to success in general supplication; and he advises a concert or agreement for this purpose. Many graduates of Middlebury College observe the hour from 8 to 9 o'clock on Sunday morning as the time of special prayer on behalf of their Alma Mater, that God would pour out his Spirit on the institution, and call young men from among its students to the work of the ministry. The writer says:—

"Middlebury College, the first half of the period of its existence, was highly favored in respect to the outpourings of the Spirit. During these years, every class but one was permitted to share in a religious awakening, and some classes received three or four such visits of mercy while in College. Many that have preached the Gospel at home and labored with success as missionaries abroad, were led in these seasons of revival to rejoice in the hope of the glory of God. It is a remarkable fact, that of the class alluded to, as having been the first to go through college without a revival, six were soon after brought to the knowledge of the truth as it is in Jesus. There then lived those who prayed for the college with an importunity not to be denied."

LETTER FROM ELD. ESTEE.

Jackson, Ohio, Oct. 18, 1850.

I am now about leaving Ohio, with the design of visiting our brethren in Virginia. In a former communication, an extract from which was published in the Recorder, I stated briefly the condition of the Churches in Ohio, and referred to their wants. Since the date of that communication their prospects have been steadily brightening, and at this time are more auspicious than at any previous period in their history. The spirit of progress has been widely diffused, and its healthful influence is quite perceptible. Its tendency has been to allay discord, and cement the bonds of union among the brethren. There is a happy agreement as to what is necessary to their prosperity. All agree that the labors of a missionary are imperiously demanded within the limits of the Ohio Churches. With great unanimity they have made choice of Eld. Lewis A. Davis as their Missionary, who, they expect, will commence his labors among them in a short time. As to the importance and feasibility of starting a school in Jackson, which may hereafter assume the character of an academy, there is but little difference of opinion. In relation to this matter our brethren here have taken a noble stand. They have resolved on starting a school, having employed Bro. Franklin Babcock as the teacher to engage in the enterprise. During the recent session of the South-Western Association, a meeting was called to consider the subject of education, and discuss the question as to the propriety and feasibility of starting a school in Jackson. A much larger congregation convened than was anticipated, and an interest in the cause of education was awakened which was truly encouraging. Elder R. Babcock was appointed Chairman of the meeting, and addressed the congregation with remarks appropriate and interesting. He was followed by A. Estee, L. A. Davis, B. Clement, and others. At this meeting it was resolved with great unanimity to start a school, and a Board of Trustees were appointed, and other preliminary steps were taken for its organization. I cherish the sanguine hope that the school which is about to be started under the supervision of Bro. Babcock may prosper, and hereafter occupy an important place among the literary institutions in our highly favored land. As it is designed to elevate this school, so that it may, as soon as practicable, possess the character of an Academy, I trust that some of our young men, who have a heart for the work, and who are favored with the requisite literary attainments, will be willing to make the needful sacrifice, and engage in the glorious enterprise of building up a Literary Institution in Western Ohio.

AZOR ESTEE.

Death of Rev. Dr. Cote.—The life of this valuable and devoted missionary terminated at Hinesburgh, Vt., on the morning of the 4th ult. He came to Hinesburgh about two weeks previous, to attend the anniversary of the Lamoille Baptist Association. During the first day of the meeting, in an impressive manner he presented the claims of the mission with which he has been for seven years so intimately connected. In the evening he became somewhat ill; the best medical aid was promptly secured, but in spite of all that could be done, disease traveled on in its might until it conquered. From an early period in his sickness he had a settled impression that he should not recover. His sufferings were intense, but in the midst of them Christian patience had its perfect work. To those around him he would say, "Talk to me about God." On one occasion he remarked, "In me you see a perfect development of physical suffering and of spiritual peace." When a Christian brother said to him, "It does not seem as though you could be spared from the mission," he replied, "God's thoughts are not as our thoughts, nor his ways as our ways." And so it proved. He was but 41 years of age, full of life and strength, and just in the midst of a great work, when unexpectedly the Master called, and he ascended to his reward. His remains were carried to Grand Ligne for interment.

Heidelberg University, Germany.—Rev. J. W. C. Pennington, pastor of a colored church in New York, to whom the honorary D.D. was worthily voted by this venerable University, took the opportunity of his attendance at the Peace Congress to visit Heidelberg to receive the proffered honor. A correspondent of the Boston Atlas thus describes the scene:—

"The ceremony of presenting the diploma was accompanied with the following words: 'You are the first African who has received this dignity from a European University, and it is the University of Heidelberg that thus pronounces the universal brotherhood of humanity.' The new Doctor returned thanks in the name of his brethren of Africa and America. He expressed a hope that the time is not far distant when slavery will everywhere cease, and all races be united in fraternal bonds. He then pronounced a short address in Latin, instead of the usual Latin dispute, and the ceremony ended."

"HARPER'S NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE" for November completes the first volume of that interesting and successful work. Besides the usual variety of original and selected matter, this number contains a long extract from the forthcoming number of Lossing's "Field Book of the Revolution," giving a description of the author's visit to the battle-fields of Lexington, Concord, and Bunker Hill, embellished with several wood engravings. The Publishers say, that "the popularity of the work has outstripped their most sanguine expectations. Although but six months have elapsed since it was first announced, it has already attained a regular monthly issue of more than Fifty Thousand copies, and the rate of its increase is still unchecked. Under these circumstances, they would consider themselves as failing in duty, as well as in gratitude to the public, if they omitted any exertion within their power to increase its substantial value and its attractiveness. They will spare neither labor nor expense in any department of the work; freely lavishing both upon the editorial aid, the pictorial embellishments, the typography, and the general literary resources, by which they hope to give to the Magazine a popular circulation unequaled by that of any similar periodical ever published in the world."

JENNY LIND is still giving Concerts in New York three evenings a week, and has full houses at three dollars a ticket. Mr. Barnum has announced, however, that this will continue for a few nights only, after which she will proceed to Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington, Charleston, Havana, New Orleans, St. Louis, Cincinnati, &c. It is expected that she will sail for England in May next, so as to be in London at the time of the great World's Fair. Those who intend to hear her should embrace their earliest opportunity.

A FAMILY OF MINISTERS.—The Presbyterian Herald says that the Rev. W. W. Martin, a venerable Presbyterian minister, who died on the 30th ult. at Livonia in Indiana, left behind him two sons, missionaries in China; four sons-in-law, Presbyterian ministers; and one in the Theological Seminary at New-Albany, preparing for the missionary work, making eight ministers in one family.

EMBARKATION OF MISSIONARIES.—Rev. B. C. Thomas and wife, missionaries appointed to labor among the Karens in Tavoy, embarked on Thursday, the 17th ult., on board the ship Soldan, for Calcutta. Miss L. Crawford went out in the same vessel to join the Free Will Baptist Mission at Balasore, Orissa.

MISSIONARIES FOR THE EAST INDIES.—Rev. Dr. A. Sutton and wife, for the Crissa Mission, and Rev. Dr. Poor and wife, for Ceylon, have taken passage in the ship Townsend, at Boston, for Calcutta.

ATTEMPT AT BANK ROBBERY—ONE OF THE ROBBERS SHOT DEAD.—At 2 o'clock Thursday morning, Oct. 31, an attempt was made to break into the Village Bank, North Danvers, Mass. The robbers began their attempt to burst the door in, when the watchman of the Bank, named Aaron Batterman, called upon them to desist, which they refused to do. He then fired a gun loaded with ball, hitting one of them in the side, who staggered a few paces and fell dead. He proved to be John C. Page, brother-in-law of the Cashier of the Bank. His father, who lived in the nearest building to the Bank, was aroused by the noise of the gun, and coming out stumbled over his dead son's body. It appears that the Bank Directors have had warning that an attempt would be made to rob the Bank, and have had a watchman there for a week past, which was generally unknown. The three companions of the deceased are supposed to have been regular robbers, and to have drawn Page, who was of rather bad habits, into the attempt. They all escaped in a carriage they had brought with them. [Tribune.

PENNSYLVANIA COPPER AND LEAD.—It is reported that an extensive Copper and Lead formation has been discovered in Pennsylvania, near the Schuylkill river, and only about twenty miles from Philadelphia; and the extent of the metal is, from present appearances, such as to warrant the expectation of a very large business arising out of it. Some of the veins have been successfully worked within the past year. The copper ore is said to bear a striking resemblance to that of Cornwall and Cuba mines. The average yield of 2,000 tuns has been 20 per cent. of pure copper. The lead and silver ore, which is also abundant, has been assayed and carries about 75 per cent. of lead, and will yield of silver about $35 to the tun

FUGITIVE SLAVES.—The owners of a number of fugitive slaves now in Philadelphia and New York, have either gone on or are preparing to go, for the purpose of reclaiming their property. We have heard of some dozen cases within the past ten days, where the proper and requisite papers to prove titles have been procured. We also understand that several gentlemen are about proceeding to Boston to claim several slaves who are known to be in that city, and will carry with them every legal requisite to prove their property. Some of our energetic police will probably accompany them.

DAMAGES FOR ENTICING A MINOR TO GO A WHALING.—In the Middlesex Court of Common Pleas, sitting at Lowell, Butterfield brings an action against Ashly and others to recover damages for enticing away the plaintiff's minor son, and shipping him at New Bedford on a whaling voyage. The plaintiff lived in Claremont, N. H. His son ran away, and shipped with defendants on board the whale ship Saratoga; deserted, as appeared by a deposition put in by Ashly, at the Sandwish Islands, and has not since been heard from by his father. The Jury found for the plaintiff, and assessed the damages at $305,50.

Slave Hunting in Boston.

The following account of an unsuccessful attempt at slave-catching in Boston, is given by a correspondent of the New York Tribune. The editor of that paper says it comes from a responsible source, and may be relied upon as a correct statement of the affair.

BOSTON, Thursday, Oct. 31.

The slave hunters, Knight and Hughes, left the City yesterday at 2 o'clock P. M., fully persuaded, after a week's trial, that all attempts to arrest Wm. and Ellen Crafts in the City of Boston, were worse than useless. Yet not a blow has been struck, or an act of violence done!

As soon as it was known that they were about to take out a warrant, the Vigilance Committee was called together, and various sub-committees appointed. Among these was a committee of legal gentlemen, whose duty it was to give Crafts the benefit of every legal weapon of offense or defense. This committee consisted of S. C. Sewall, Charles Sumner, R. H. Dana, jr., John C. Park and George Minot. In addition to these gentlemen, Charles G. Loring, Esq., one of the most distinguished lawyers in the State, volunteered his services. After full deliberation, this committee notified the Commissioners, that if they acted under the law, they would be sued, on the ground of the unconstitutionality of their appointment, and that the same course would be taken with the Marshal and his deputies, or any other persons who should act under the direction of the Commissioner. The ground was taken that the process under this law is a civil process, and that the outer door of a house cannot be broken in for the purpose of serving it, and the Marshal was notified accordingly. Crafts moved his bed and clothing into his shop, and made it his domicil—his castle.

In the mean time Crafts, on his own responsibility, without advice from any parties, determined on resistance. He armed himself fully, and made up his mind to sell his freedom with his life. His shop is in the midst of the negro population, who were in a state of intense excitement, armed and determined upon resistance. No man could approach within a hundred yards of Craft's shop without being seen by a hundred eyes, and a signal would call a powerful body at a moment's warning. The Marshal's assistants made reconnoisances and were perfectly satisfied that if the "outer-door" doctrine prevailed, the process could not be served at all, and if that doctrine was not adhered to, the process could only be served with bloodshed.

It must be distinctly understood, that this forcible resistance was a matter with which the Committees had no concern whatever, They confined themselves to legal measures solely.

As an offset to the Roman simplicity and grandeur of this poor man, seated camly at work at his saddler's bench, in an upper chamber, the Spartacus of his race, there was a ludicrous side of the picture. Knight and Hughes were themselves arrested and held to bail in $10,000 each, on a charge of slander. After some difficulty they found bail. The next day they were arrested on a charge of conspiracy to kidnap William Crafts, and again in the afternoon on a similar charge as to Ellen Crafts. Two arrests a day was their smallest allowance. After the last arrest, the excited crowd of negroes followed Knight's carriage, and he took flight through Court and Leverett streets, over East Cambridge bridge, running tolls, to East Cambridge, and thence to Porter's. The mob overtook and threatend him, and it was with difficulty that some of them were kept from violence, but no actual violence was inflicted. Knight was thoroughly alarmed. A portion of the Vigilance Committee waited upon him and Hughes, and told them that they had no intention to threaten them, but that their presence periled the peace of the city as well as their own lives. They promised to leave the city the next morning; but when the morning came they were not gone. Several complaints were made against them, and prepared to be served—one for carrying concealed weapons; another for "smoking in the streets," contrary to the City Ordinance; another under the statute against "profane cursing and swearing" (a plenty of which they did); another for missing toll over the bridge; and still another for fast driving through the town of Cambridge. Truly the Bostonians are a law-abiding people! The combination of the tragical and the comical, the serious and the ludicrous, with the harrassment of handbills, arrests, and crowds at their heels wherever they went, and the certainty that their process could not be served without bloodshed, overcame their obstinacy, and they took the express train for the South, waited upon by a large and respectable committee.

Knight and Hughes are said to be men of low description, mere hirelings or speculators, deserving no better treatment than they received. These various arrests, however, were not made by the legal committee, but were the voluntary suggestions of parties taking the responsibility upon themselves. The committee were prepared to serve a writ de homine repligiando upon the Marshal, the moment the arrest should be made, and thus to raise an issue between the State and National tribunals. They also proposed to hold Crafts to bail for debt, in order to try the question whether the certificate of the Commissioner will override the civil processes of the State, made for other purposes. As a last resort, Crafts was to be arrested on a criminal charge, for violent assaults, with dangerous weapons, if he used them, and thus raise the final question of precedence between a criminal process of the State and the certificate of the Commissioner. If no other criminal charge could be raised, it was proposed, with his own consent, to arrest him for fornication, (which is a criminal offense in Massachusetts,) on account of the invalidity of his slave marriage.

These various technical obstructions and contrivances were raised, not against the Constitution, but against the odious and unconstitutional statute. Had the statute been no more than the Constitution requires, no legal resistance would have been made, except on the real issues between the parties. As for the forcible resistance of the negroes, how can they distinguish between the Constitution and a statute? They only receive the simple idea that, without trial or notice, father, mother, husband, wife or child, brother or sister, may be snatched from each other, and from home, and hurried into captivity in an unknown and hostile land.

There are rumors that the President has authorized the Marshal to employ a portion of the standing army to enforce his precept and to "punish" offenders. We do not believe he has done or intends to do any such thing. He knows that the whole standing army of the United States, which took Mexico and Monterey, cannot break down a poor man's outer door to serve a civil process, or "punish" any citizen for any crime whatever.

Three Days Later from Europe.

By the steamer Canada, three days later news has been received from all parts of Europe.

The political and general news, since the sailing of the Pacific, is wholly destitute of interest. The Queen has returned to the Isle of Wight.

Five new Bishoprics have been created in the Anglo-Catholic Church.

Cardinal Wiesmar has received the appointment of Archbishop in Ireland.

The great Education bill continues to occupy a large share of public attention, and the Catholic Bishops and Clergy are urging a scheme for their own University with much energy.

The English and Irish papers supply details of many outrages, ending in robbery and murder.

In various places of three Counties farming operations for the Spring crop are commenced upon an extensive scale. It is said that an immense breadth of Wheat will be sown in England and Ireland this year.

From Italy there is news of the final breaking off of the negotiations between Rome and Piedmont. Count Pinelli, the Envoy of the latter power at Rome, received his passports, and left for home on the 7th, having accomplished nothing.

Nothing new has occurred in the relative position of the contending armies since the assault on Friederichstadt, as it is now confidently asserted that diplomacy will be called in to settle all difficulties. England and France are named as the mediating powers. The numbers killed and wounded in the last affair are variously stated, but it appears certain that the people of Friederichstadt suffered severely from the effects of the shells thrown into the town by the Holsteiners. Many persons, under great deprivation, have been obliged to abandon the place. A public subscription has been started to meet the exigency, and the King of Denmark subscribed $1,000 to the fund.

The great æronaut of Paris, M. Poiteirn, after having stimulated curiosity by ascending to the clouds on horses and ostriches, both with and without his wife similarly mounted to accompany him, has hit upon a device still more piquant and original. On Sunday, the 13th, he went up from the Hippodrome. The Uranus, his balloon, bore him and along with him three young women belonging to the Hippodrome, suspended from the car. They had wings affixed to their shoulders, and appeared as if flying in the air. Their ascent was hailed with shouts from the immense concourse of persons assembled, but a feeling of terror seemed to predominate, at seeing the women suspended in mid-air, without anything apparent to support them. After being about an hour in the air, the flying adventurers alighted in safety on a plain ner Villejuif.

Notice to Bounty Land Claimants.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
WASHINGTON, Oct. 31, 1850.

Applicants for Bounty Land, or for information in relation thereto, are requested to address their communications on that subject to the Commissioner of Pensions direct. Their transmission through the Department proper imposes on it a very great and unnecessary amount of labor, and the additional examination they must thereby necessarily undergo, only creates delay and increases their liability to be lost or mislaid.

Whenever new questions arise under the law, the decision of the Department will be communicated to the Commissioner of Pensions, and he will thereby be enabled, as he is required to do promptly to acknowledge the receipt of all communications, and answer such inquiries as may be made.

As numerous inquiries have been directed to those points, it may be well to state:—

1st. That where the service has been rendered by a substitute, he is the person entitled to the benefit of the law, and not his employer.

2d. That the widow of a soldier who has rendered the service required by the law is entitled to bounty land, provided she was a widow at the passage of the law, although she may have been married a second time; but if not a widow at that time, the benefit of the act enures to the minor children of the deceased soldier.

3d. That no person who has received or is entitled to bounty land under a prior law, is entitled to the benefit of the act of the 28th September, 1850.

4th. That no soldier is entitled to more than one warrant under this act, although he may have served several terms; but where a soldier has served several terms, he will receive a warrant for the greatest quantity of land to which those several terms, consolidated, will entitle him.

ALEX. H. H. STUART, Sec. of the Interior.

SAD LOSS OF LIFE AT ORONO, ME.—The Bangor Mercury has an account of a sad loss of life which occurred at Orono, Me., on Tuesday afternoon, the 29th ult. It appears that a party of some fifteen or twenty men, at work for Mr. Joseph Clark, were engaged in dividing and removing a pile of edgings, which had accumulated to the extent of two or three hundred cords at the spot where the accident occurred, which was at the southwest end of the "Babcock Block" of mills. While they were at the work the pile parted suddenly, and without a moment's notice five of the men were plunged into the swift, wild torrent, four of whom were seen no more. The fifth, Samuel Young, caught a bunch of edgings and supported himself till he was able to seize a broom-stick at one of the mills below, to which he owed his life.

Geo. Thompson, the English Anti-Slavery Agitator, who arrived per the Canada, last week, is to have a reception from the colored people and other abolitionists, in Faneuil Hall, Boston.

SUMMARY.

One of the census takers for Greene County, Mr. McCoy, says the Xenia (Ohio) Torchlight, informs us of an instance of precocity that came under his observation in the eastern part of that County, which we venture to say is unparalleled in this latitude. The parties are a married couple, the husband 18, and the wife 16. They have been married about four years, and have two children—one of which is over three years of age, and the other over one.

The New-Albany (Ind.) Bulletin tells the following: Wm. Gross, the young man who was lately convicted of murder, in the confession of his guilt, which was given in evidence on his trial, stated that he had no motive in the perpetration of the inhuman act, except the desire to gratify a fiendish thirst for blood, and a demoniacal satisfaction in seeing the death struggles of his fellow-beings, which feeling he had imbibed during the Mexican campaign.

Accounts received from Sydney, New-South Wales, dated June 1, report that a tremendous hurricane had occurred at Navigator's Island April 16. There is hardly a house left standing on the Island. The ship Favorite, (whaler) of New-London, Hercules, of New-Bodford, and schooner Clara, were stranded by the force of the gale.

The enterprising house of G. W. McHenry & Co. intend to issue cabin passage certificates for the Industrial Exhibition to take place in London next year. The tickets for the excursion to Liverpool and back are to be furnished at the low price of $100, including everything but wines and liquors. The trips will commence with the packet ship Mary Pleasants, to sail on 15th March next.

A new bark called the Fanny, now fitting for California at St. Stephens, N. B., and partly owned in Boston, has on board as a portion of her cargo, an entire steamboat, with all her usual fixtures attached, except the smoke funnel, which has been taken down. She is 125 feet in length, 30 feet wide from outside to outside of paddle-boxes.

Aliens who came to the United States under 18 years of age, can be naturalized at the age of 21. In either cases the applicant must be a resident for five years, and must have made a declaration of his intention two years before being admitted as a citizen. In both cases the fact of the required residence must be proved by witnesses who are citizens native or naturalized.

From all quarters of the Island of Newfoundland we hear of the extensive destruction of the potato crop. It is no longer a matter of fear or doubt, but an absolute fact, that a very small proportion of the potatoes sown will be fit for human food. Coupled with this calamity, the catch of fish this season, though perhaps not below an average, will prove miserably deficient in some localities.

The Southern Rights meeting at Wilmington, N. C. on Wednesday declared in favor of establishing a Southern Commercial Marine, in order to render them independant of Northern manufacturers and ship-owners,—and that the repeal of the Fugitive Slave Law, or the abolition of Slavery in the District of Columbia, will justify and require secession.

A vessel manned by twenty or thirty slaves, and belonging to two gentlemen from the South, left Philadelphia a few days ago for California, with a number of passengers on board. The vessel was built and was fitted out for sea by the slaves. They are to work in the mines, and have accepted their masters' proposal to set them free at the end of a stated period.

Land Warrants continue dull at $125 and $130. The Land Offices in Illinois have been closed for two or three weeks past, in order that the State may select the lands granted under the act of the last Congress for the benefit of the Chicago and Mobile Railroad, and this has tended to check the demand for locations.

In a bigamy case in Brooklyn, N. Y., Judge Rockwell decided that a man living with a woman in a state of adultery, and calling her his wife, is for all legal purposes her husband, and may not only be made liable for her debts and acts, but may be prosecuted if he weds another during the lifetime of his paramour.

The Circuit in Van Buren, Arkansas, lately tried the suit of Wm. Ward vs. James Cougar, for seducing plaintiff's daughter, a girl 15 years old. The Jury gave a verdict for Mr. Ward of $5,000 damages, and expressed their regrets that they could not legally lay the damages at $10,000.

A telegraphic dispatch from New Orleans announces the arrival of the steamship Alabama from Chagres, at that city, with later news from California. According to the dispatch, there has been another destructive conflagration in San Francisco—the third within six months.

President Fillmore has announced his determination to enforce the Fugitive Slave Law, let the consequences be what they may; and, if necessary, he will protect the United States Marshals in the discharge of their duty, by calling to their aid the force of the army.

DIED,

In Scott, on the 16th day of Oct., at the residence of his son, PAUL KENYON, in the 84th year of his age. Mr. Kenyon was born in Massachusetts, and lived there until a few years since, when he moved to Scott, Cortland Co., N. Y, where he lived with his son Charles Kenyon till his death. He was a kind-hearted father, a good and much-esteemed citizen. At his death he said that he was willing to go; then his soul winged its flight to the spirit world. COMM.

In Verona, N. Y., on the 23d of October, of inflammation of the lungs, Mrs. MARY WILLIAMS, widow of Ray Williams, aged 68 years. Sister Williams made a profession of religion in early life, and united with a First-day Baptist Church. Some years after, she embraced the Sabbath of the Lord, and united with the first Seventh-day Baptist Church in Verona, soon after its organization, of which she remained a member, and an example of piety, until called to join the church above. During her last distressing illness, which continued about a week, she manifested calm resignation to the will of God. She has left a number of children, and a large circle of relatives, to mourn her loss. In her death the Church is bereaved of one of its brightest ornaments.

In Trenton, N. Y., October 8th, Mr. SAMUEL GREENMAN, in the 65th year of his age. The subject of this notice evinced a living and unwavering faith in Jesus Christ as his all-sufficient Saviour. He made an early profession of the religion of Jesus, in the Seventh-day Baptist Church, and continued in their communion until by death he was transferred to the church triumphant. In his disposition he was meek and affectionate, a kind husband and a loving parent. For several years he suffered much from ill health. His severe sickness continued about three weeks, during which he expressed the strongest confidence in Christ and his assurance of being accepted in his kingdom. His last words, uttered but a few minutes before his death, were, "O, how happy I am!" He has left several children, and many relatives and friends, to lament their loss.

In Lincklaen, N. Y., Oct. 19, LYDIA ELVIRA CRANDALL, daughter of Dea. Wm. G. Crandall, aged 15 years. Sister Crandall was a member of the Church in Lincklaen, in the fellowship of which a well-ordered life had testified to her early piety. But the fortitude with which she bore her last painful illness, and the composure with which she awaited death, were a demonstration of the power of faith in the triumphs of victory.

In DeRuyter, Oct. 28, NORMAN L. CRUMB, only child of Benjamin and Ann Jennette Crumb, aged eleven months and twenty-eight days.

In Brookfield, N. Y., September 28th, Mrs. SIMEON CLARK, aged 88 years.

Miscellaneous.

From Bentley's Miscellany.

Snakes and Serpent Charmers.

At the present time there are at the London Zoological Gardens two Arabs, who are eminently skilled in what is termed "snake-charming." In this country, happily for ourselves, we have little practical acquaintance with venomous serpents, and there is no scope for the development of native skill in the art referred to; the visit, therefore, of these strangers is interesting, as affording an opportunity of beholding feats which have hitherto been known to us only by description. We propose, therefore, to give some account of their proceedings.

The names of these are Jubar-Abou-Haijah, and Mohammed-Abou-Merwan. The former is an old man, much distinguished in his native country for his skill. When the French occupied Egypt, he collected serpents for their naturalists, and was sent for to Cairo to perform before General Bonaparte. He described to us the General, as a middle-sized man, very pale, with handsome features, and a most keen eye. Napoleon watched his proceedings with great interest, made many inquiries, and dismissed him with a handsome "backsheesh." Jubar is usually dressed in a coarse, loose bernoose of brown serge, with a red cap on his head. The gift, or craft, of serpent-charming, descends in certain families from generation to generation; and Mohammed, a smart, active lad, is the old man's son-in-law, although not numbering sixteen years. He is quite an Adonis as to dress, wearing a smart, richly-embroidered dark-green jacket, carried—hussar fashion—over his right shoulder, a white loose vest, full white trowsers, tied at the knee, scarlet stockings and slippers, and a fez or red cap, with a blue tassel of extra proportions on his head. In his right ear is a ring, so large that it might pass for a curtain ring.

Precisely as the clock strikes four, one of the keepers places on a platform a wooden box containing the serpents, and the lad Mohammed proceeds to tuck his ample sleeves as far up as possible, to leave the arms bare. He then takes off his cloth jacket, and, opening the box, draws out a large Cobra de Capello, of a dark copper color; this he holds at arm's length by the tail, and after allowing it to writhe about in the air for some time, he places the serpent on the floor, still holding it as described. By this time the corba had raised his hood, very indignant at the treatment he is receiving. Mohammed then pinches and teases him in every way; at each pinch the corba strikes at him, but, with great activity, the blow is avoided. Having thus teased the snake for some time, Mohammed rises, and placing his foot upon the tail, irritates him with a stick. The corba writhes, and strikes sometimes at the stick, sometimes at his tormentor's legs, and again at his hands, all which is avoided with the utmost nonchalance. After the lapse of about ten minutes, Mohammed coils the corba on the floor, and leaves him while he goes to the box, and draws out another far fiercer corba. While holding this by the tail, Mohammed buffets him on the head with his open hand, and the serpent, quite furious, frequently seizes him by the forearm. The lad merely wipes the spot, and proceeds to tie the serpent like a necklace around his neck. Then the tail is tied into a knot around the reptiles head, and again head and tail into a double knot. After amusing himself in this way for some time, the serpent is told to lie quiet, and stretched on his back, the neck and chin being gently stroked. Whether any sort of mesmeric influence is produced, we know not, but the snake remains on its back, perfectly still, as if dead. During this time the first corba has remained coiled up, with head erect, apparently watching the proceedings of the Arab. After a pause, the lad takes up the second cobra, and carrying it to the first, pinches and irritates both, to make them fight; the fiercer snake seizes the other by the throat, and coiling round him, they roll struggling across the stage. Mohammed then leaves these serpents in charge of Jubar, and draws a third snake out of the box. This he first ties in a variety of apparently impossible knots, and then holding him at a little distance from his face, allows the snake to strike at it, just dodging back each time sufficiently far to avoid the blow. The serpent is then placed in his bosom next his skin, and left there, but it is not so easy after a time to draw it out of its warm resting-place. The tail is pulled; but no! the serpent is round the lad's body, and will not come. After several unsuccessful efforts, Mohammed rubs the tail briskly between his two hands, a process which—judging from the writhings of the serpent, which are plainly visible—is the reverse of agreeable. At last Mohammed pulls him hand-over-hand—as the sailors say—and, just as the head flies out, the cobra makes a parting snap at his tormentor's face, for which he receives a smart cuff on the head, and is then with the others replaced in the box.

Dr. John Davy, in his valuable work on Ceylon, denies that the fangs are extracted from the serpents which are thus exhibited; and says that the only charm employed is that of courage and confidence—the natives avoiding the stroke of the serpent with wonderful agility; adding, that they will play their tricks with any hooded snake, but with no other poisonous serpent.

In order that we might get at the truth, we sought it from the fountain-head, and our questions were thus most freely answered by Jubar-Abou-Haijah, Hamet acting as interpreter:

Q. How are the serpents caught in the first instance?

A. I take this adze (holding up a sort of geological hammer mounted on a long handle) and as soon as I have found a hole containing a cobra, I knock away the earth till he comes out, or can be got at; I then take a stick in my right hand, and seizing the snake by the tail with the left, hold it at arm's length. He keeps trying to bite, but I push his head away with the stick. After doing this some time I throw him straight on the ground, still holding him by the tail; I allow him to raise his head and try to bite, for some time, in order that he may learn how to attack, still keeping him off with the stick. When this has been done long enough, I slide the stick up to his head and fix it firmly in the ground; then taking the adze, and forcing open the mouth, I break off the fangs with it, carefully removing every portion, and especially squeezing out all the poison and blood, which I wipe away as long as it continues to flow; when this is done, the snake is harmless and ready for use.

Q. Do the ordinary jugglers, or only the hereditary snake-charmers, catch the cobras?

A. We are the only persons who dare to catch them, and when the jugglers want snakes they come to us for them; with that adze (pointing to the hammer,) I have caught and taken out the fangs of many thousands.

Q. Do you use any others besides the cobras for your exhibitions?

A. No; because the cobra is the only one that will fight well. The cobra is always ready to give battle, but the other snakes are sluggish to give battle, and can't be taught for our exhibitions.

Q. What do the Arabs do if they happen to be bitten by a poisonous snake?

A. They immediately tie a cord tight round above the wound, and cut out the bitten part as soon as possible—some burn it; they then squeeze the arm downward, so as to press out the poison, but they don't suck it, because it is bad for the mouth; however, in spite of this, they sometimes die.

Q. Do you think it possible that cobras could be exhibited without the fangs being removed?

A. Certainly not, for the least scratch of their deadly teeth would cause death, and there is not a day that we exhibit that we are not bitten, and no skill in the world would prevent it.

Such were the particulars given us by a most distinguished professor in the art of snake-charming, and, therefore, they may be relied on as correct; the matter-of-fact way in which he acted, as well as related the snake-catching, bore the impress of truth, and there certainly would appear to be far less mystery about the craft, than has generally been supposed.

Sketch of the Life of Jenny Lind.

This greatest of modern singers, was born in Stockholm. Her parents filled a comparatively humble position in life, and when Jenny first came into the world, nothing augured her future reputation. She was a lovely and modest child, and from her earliest days was passionately fond of melody. Her first accents were almost made in music. One day, when she was merely five or six years of age, a Swedish actress heard the child singin,g and was so surprised by the almost marvelous purity of her voice and the talent and native skill even then displayed by the child in its management, that she spoke of it to Herr Crœlius, a music master, then resident in Stockholm. He came and heard the child sing, and instantly determined on presenting her to the Count Puke, as a candidate for admission to the musical school attached to the Royal Theatre, of which he was the manager. The Count Puke at first made some difficulties, but after hearing her sing, was even more astonished than Herr Crœlius had been, and consented to her admission. She accordingly entered the conservatory at this early age, and was placed under the tuition of Eramus, a profound and skillful musician. After studying under this master for several years, the public were surprised one evening at seeing a child appear in a vaudeville, in which she had to sing. This child was Jenny Lind. Such was her success, that she became a public favorite, and after a short time, began to appear in opera. At this period of her life, every thing seemed to bid fair for the future, and the child looked forward to the day in which she might hold a position in her art. This, however, was a dream which was destined to be dispelled by a misfortune to which she had not looked forward. It was the loss of her voice, when she was about fourteen years of age. She was compelled to retire from the theatre, and again practice her art alone, and in the privacy of her own apartments.

At length her voice returned to her, but it was no longer the voice she once had, nor had it yet acquired the wonderful beauty and purity which now marks it. She now managed to go to Paris, and place herself under the tuition of Signor Garcia, who, however, at first little foreboded the future eminence which his pupil was to obtain. And very frequently has he said: "If Lind had more voice at her disposal, nothing could prevent her becoming the greatest of modern singers; but as it is, she must be content with singing second to many who will not have one half her genius."

Her voice, nevertheless, gradually strengthened, and she was at length summoned to Stockholm. Here she again entered the theatre, and speedily became again a public favorite in Sweden. But during her residence in Paris, she had made the acquaintance of Giacomo Meyerbeer, the celebrated composer. This great man had formed a friendship for Jenny, and e'er two years had elapsed, she received an invitation from him to join the opera at Berlin. To this she consented, and soon after repaired to Berlin, in 1842 or 1843. We are unable to name the precise year, but it was in one of these she first appeared there. One evening, however, when she was singing in Robert le Diable, she felt that it had returned, and inspired by the consciousness, sang the music of Alice with such a force and power, combined with the sweetness to which the public had become accustomed, that she electrified them, and astonished Meyerbeer, who from that moment regarded her as the first of modern singers. Everything was now changed for her. She rapidly progressed in public estimation, and her reputation soon spread through the whole of Germany, which at present, is, perhaps, the most musical nation in Continental Europe. Soon after this, a musical festival was held at Bonn, upon the Rhine; and the Queen of England, who was then on a visit to His Prussian Majesty, attended it. Jenny Lind was engaged at the festival, and the English critics who attended it, wrote back such warm accounts of her singing, that it was not difficult to fortell that she would soon come to England. Accordingly, towards the end of the year, M. Bellinaye came to Berlin, and through the medium of Lord Westmoreland, was presented to Jenny Lind, whom he had the satisfaction of engaging to appear, under Mr. Lumley's management, the following season.

Her success in England was such as at once to rank her, in the estimation of London, as the very first of modern singers, and this, too, at a season when Alboni had made her first appearance there, and Viardot Garcia had returned to the English stage, in all the triumph of a continental reputation. From this period her reputation has remained unchanged. Incredible sums have been paid for the purpose of hearing her. She has sung in Vienna and every capital of Germany with the same extraordinary success.

At her Majesty's Theatre, in London, crowds have been in attendance around the pit and gallery doors as early as three in the afternoon on the nights on which she was to appear. She has sung before the Queen of England, repeatedly in private, and has indeed appeared at all the Courts in Germany and Northern Europe, excepting that of Russia, nor has she been merely received as a singer, but as a woman, the spotless virtue of whose life and whose extraordinary and splendid charities equally entitle her to the admiration and love of the public.

The Advancement of Learning.

The British Association for the Advancement of Science assembled this year at Edinburgh, and its first general meeting was held on Wednesday, the 31st of July, when Sir David Brewster, upon taking the chair, delivered a very interesting address upon the history of the Association, and the progress of the Sciences. On Thursday, business began in all the sections, and in the evening Professor Bennett delivered a lecture on the passage of the blood through the minute vesicles of animals, in connection with nutrition. On Friday, a party of about seventy started under the direction of Mr. R. Chambers, to examine into the groovings on the western face of Corstophine Hill, and the striæ on the sandstone near Ravelstone. They afterward visited Arthur's Seat and St. Margaret's, where they examined the striated rocks and stones. In the evening there was a conversazione and promenade. Saturday was devoted to excursions. On Monday afternoon upward of two hundred members dined together, Sir David Brewster presiding. In the evening, Dr. Mantell delivered a lecture on the extinct birds of New Zealand. On Tuesday evening there was a full-dress promenade and soirée. On Wednesday, the general Committee assembled to sanction the grants that had passed the Committee of Recomendations; and in the afternoon of the same day, the concluding general meeting of the Association, for the accustomed ceremonial proceedings, was held. The next annual meeting is to take place at Ipswich, and Mr. Airy, the Astronomer-Royal, will preside. The meeting, altogether, was one of unusual interest; among the persons present were the chief lights of science, in the empire and from the continent, and our own country was represented by Prof. Hitchcock and several other scholars. The papers read in the various sections were numerous, and some of them are described as of very remarkable freshness and value. They will soon be accessible in the published "Transactions," which will this year be more voluminous than ever.

Bad Effects of Drinking Scotch Whiskey.

The Judge was a great admirer of whiskey punch. One night, on circuit, some scamps of lawyers, after the old gentleman was pretty oblivious, determined to play him a trick, and letting the inn-keeper into the joke, wrapped a number of the latter's silver spoons in a handkerchief, and stowed them away in the Judge's trunk. The next morning, while the stage was leisurely wading through a stretch of sandy road, who should overtake them at full speed but the tavern-keeper, who, with much apparent embarrassment, made his errand known. He informed the party that he had missed some spoons from his house, and as he intended making a thorough search, he was afraid some he suspected would not let him do so. But if he should say to them, "You needn't be so particular now; I've just left Judge B—— and Mr. So and So, and they didn't hinder me, the rogues would n't have a word to say in excuse." "Oh, certainly, certainly!" cried every body, all but the Judge being in the joke; and down they all jumped, opened their trunks one after another, and shook the separate articles of clothing to show there was nothing in them. Presently it was the Judge's turn. "Oh, to be sure!" said he producing his keys. But the search among his properties was scarce begun, when to his tremendous amazement, out of a handkerchief dropped the landlord's spoons! Every one looked at the Judge. After a moment's reflection, he broke out with—"Well, now, boys, you see its all owing to that miserable Scotch whiskey I drank last night. I know it's that which made me steal these spoons."

They never enlightened the Judge, and he always firmly believed there was nothing like Scotch whiskey for weakening a man's sense of right—especially touching the appropriation of his neighbor's property. In fact, it was said, whenever a prisoner charged with stealing was brought before him, he would gravely ask if he had n't been drinking Scotch whiskey lately, "for if you have," he would add, "you'd better leave it off, I tell you; I stole spoons once!"

Talent Acquired.

As it is in the body, so it is in the mind; practice makes it what it is, and most, even of those excellences which are looked as on natural endowments, will be found, when examined into more narrowly, to be the product of exercise, and to be raised to that pitch by repeated actions. Some men are remarked for pleasantness in raillery, others for apologues and apposite diverting stories. This is apt to be taken for the effect of pure nature, and that the rather because it is not got by rules; those who excel in either of them never purposely set themselves to the study of it as an art to be learned. But yet it is true, that at first some lucky hit which took somebody, and gained him commendation, encouraged him to try again, inclined his thoughts and endeavors that way, till at last he insensibly got a faculty in it without perceiving how, and that is attributed wholly to nature which was much more the effect of use and practice. [Locke.

We may judge of man's character by what he loves—what pleases him. If a person manifests delight in low and sordid objects—the valgar song and debasing language—in the misfortune of his fellows, or cruelty to animals, we may at once determine the complexion of his character. On the contrary, if he loves purity, modesty, truth—if virtuous pursuits engage his heart and draw out his affections—we are satisfied that he is an upright man.

Obstructions to the Use of the Telescope.

It has been long known, both from theory and in practice, that the imperfect transparency of the earth's atmosphere, and the unequal refraction which arises from differences of temperature, combine to set a limit to the use of high magnifying powers in our telescopes. Hitherto, however, the application of such high powers was checked by the imperfections of the instruments themselves; and it is only since the construction of Lord Rosse's telescope that astronomers have found that, in our damp and variable climate, it is only during a few days of the year that telescopes of such magnitude can use successfully the high magnifying powers which they are capable of bearing. Even in a cloudless sky, when the stars are sparkling in the firmament, the astronomer is baffled by influences which are invisible, and while new planets and new satellites are being discovered by instruments comparatively small, the gigantic Polyphemus lies slumbering in his cave, blinded by thermal currents, more irresistible than the firebrand of Ulysses. As the astronomer, however, cannot command a tempest to clear his atmosphere, nor a thunder-storm to purify it, his only alternative is to remove his telescope to some southern climate, where no clouds disturb the serenity of the firmament, and no changes of temperature distract the emanations of the stars. A fact has been recently mentioned, which entitles us to anticipate great results from such a measure. The Marquis of Ormonde is said to have seen from Mount Etna, with his naked eye, the satellites of Jupiter. If this be true, what discoveries may we not expect, even in Europe, from a large reflector working above the grosser strata of our atmosphere. This noble experiment of sending a large reflector to a southern climate has been but once made in the history of science. Sir John Herschel transported his telescopes and his family to the south of Africa, and during a voluntary exile of four years' duration he enriched astronomy with many splendid discoveries. [Sir David Brewster.

Pulverized Wood for Cattle.

About three years since, (says Mr. Daniels, in Chambers' Journal,) I had occasion to send my cart-horses frequently through a piece of coppice wood, and whenever it happened that they stopped within reach of the rods, they would greedily devour every bough they could get at. This I noticed many times. At last I was led to examine the rods on which I had seen them feeding, and found them completely stripped of their branches, some of which were of a very considerable thickness. This led me to suppose that there must be some good qualities in the wood, and this consideration induced me to get some pulverized and given to the cart-horses, which experiment was repeated at several different times, until I was fully satisfied that it had no injurious effect on them. After this I was led to give it to my gig-horses with their corn; and having ascertained that it did them no injury, I had machinery prepared for reducing the wood for the purpose of food, and began to feed both cart and gig-horses, as also my cows and pigs, mixing a portion with all the food which was given them.

This practice I have continued for the last ten months. Previously to feeding my horses in this way, they had each three quarters of a peck of oats and beans given them per day, for which is now substituted three pints of barley per day. They are in equally as fine condition as when fed in the usual way, and more playful and free in their work. Soon after the wood was mixed with the fodder given to the cows, their milk as well as their condition was much improved. For several weeks past, I have been feeding sheep with the pulverized wood, together with crushed Swedish turnips, and they also improve by it. I have likewise fatted four pigs successively, mixing this food with barley meal, and the results have proved most satisfactory."

This statement, however strange it may sound, is not so startling when we remember that the woody matter of trees is, in its chemical nature, nearly allied to starch, and that it always contains some nitrogen; so that, in reality, it furnishes the ordinary materials of food in another form. We presume, however, that white-wooded, not resinous trees, are those which furnished Mr. Daniel's cattle with the ligneous pulp they thrive so well upon.

Courtship of Lilly, the Astrologer.

On his arrival in London from Leicester, he was taken into the service of Gilbert Wright, of Newgate Market, who, on dying, settled on him an annuity of twenty pounds; and his mistress cast her eyes on him as a likely lad to console her for the loss of her spouse. She accordingly threw out some gentle hints to her maid, who faithfully repeated them to Master William.

"She would have no more old husbands," she said, "and she did not want money."

William considered the matter on both sides. She had already been twice married, was not very young nor very fair, but she was wealthy. He, in his autobiography, catalogues her charms very carefully. "She was of brown complexion, corpulent, of but mean stature, plain, no education, yet a very prudent person, and of good condition." He thought the chance a very good one, and there was no time to stand shilly-shallying. One day after dinner, "when her talk was about husbands," he plucked up courage to say he thought he could find one that would exactly suit her. She asked where; whereupon, laying aside his natural bashfulness, he incontinently "saluted her, which she accepted lovingly." The courtship so briskly and happily commenced was as speedily and prosperously concluded. The very "next day she at dinner made him sit down with his hat on his head," and announced that "she intended to make him her husband; for which," says he, "I gave her many salutes." The marriage soon followed.

Quality of the Flesh of Domestic Fowls.—The quality, that is, the fineness, juciness, and richness of flavor, of the flesh of domestic fowls, is of much more importance than their size; and I consequently reject all coarse-meated fowls, however large they may be. There is no difficulty in discriminating between coarse and fine fowls, at any time. When chickens, if the down is straight and stands out, and the body and limbs are closely jointed, the meat is coarse; but if the down is glossy and lies close to the body, and the limbs are compactly formed, the meat is fine; and when grown, if the fowl is light in weight in proportion to its size, the flesh is coarse, but if heavy, the flesh is fine. There is, also, a fitness in the quality of the flesh; for if the meat is fine, the bones are fine, and the feathers are fine, and vice versa. If the flesh is fine, it is juicy and richly flavored; if coarse, dry, fibrous, and insipid. The color of the legs, too, is quite material in judging of the quality of fowls. All other things being equal, dark legged fowls have the finest flesh, and are most hardy.

New Hotel at Saratoga Springs.—A new Hotel is to be erected at Saratoga Springs, of most colossal dimensions, and on a plan and in a style which will make it the wonder and admiration of the age. It is to extend, according to a correspondent of the New York Herald, five hundred feet on Circular street, two thousand feet on Spring st., and fifteen hundred feet on Putnam street, with a piazza four thousand feet long, extending the whole length of the building. The front part of the hotel will be conducted in the ordinary mode, where the charges will range from $2 to $5 per week. The north wing will be appropriated to those who wish to occupy rooms and board themselves, and the west wing will constitute a large and commodious "Water Cure" establishment. The whole establishment will accommodate about two thousand five hundred persons, and it is estimated the grounds and buildings will cost $530,000, and the furniture $220,000. A farm of two hundred acres, two miles distant, is to be connected with the establishment, where the inmates, if they wish, can be employed in the exercise of farming and gardening, and thus pay a portion, or the whole of their expenses, as well as improve their health.

Harvesting Buckwheat.—Buckwheat requires more care in harvesting, in order to prevent loss from the shaking off the seeds, than any other crop. Some writers recommend cutting it as soon as one-third of the seeds are turned brown; others say two-thirds. If we wait for all to ripen, the earliest and best portion of the grain should be cut; and as the straw is very succulent and juicy, the unripened grain will draw nourishment from the stalk, will fill out and ripen very well after it is cut. Some prefer to cut this grain when it is wet with dew. The most approved method of harvesting is to cradle the buckwheat, and then with a rake put it into bunches about the size of ordinary wheat sheaves, and set them up without binding. By raking or rolling it together with a rake, it is interwoven in such a manner that it will stand any desirable length of time, and when sufficiently dry it may be taken up with a fork and placed on the cart without the loss of a grain. It should be threshed out immediately. It is very easily threshed, when it is in good condition. It will often be necessary to let it remain in the bunches ten or twelve days before it becomes sufficiently dried and cured. It rarely suffers any injury from exposure to rains. [Maine Farmer.

The Guinea Hen.—The Guinea Hen, or Pentado, is near an everlasting layer. They are said to unite the properties of the turkey and the pheasant. They are a native of Africa, though said by some to belong equally to this country, and are easily domesticated. Their flesh is more like that of the pheasant than the common fowl, both in color and taste, and is reckoned a very good substitute for that bird. They assimilate perfectly with the common fowl in their artificial habits and kinds of food. Their gait is peculiar, as are also their cries. They are fond of marshy places, and always perch during the night on high situations, or on trees. It is a little singular that American farmers do not turn their attention to these fowls. A knowing Jerseyman named David Bonner, from England, hired a patch of five acres four years ago, and commenced raising eggs for the New-York market. Bonner has never hired any help, and at this moment owns a farm, for which he paid $4,700, of which the buildings cost over $3,000. His farm is all paid for—he owes not a cent in the world, and he owns a flock which varies from 800 to 1,200 Guinea hens.

Temperance Fables.—The rats assembled in a large cellar to derive some method of safety in getting the bait from a small trap which lay near, having seen numbers of their friends and relations snatched away from them by its merciless jaws. After many long speeches, and the proposal of many elaborate but fruitless plans, a happy wit, standing erect, said, "It is my opinion that, if with one paw we can keep down the spring, we can safely take the food from the trap with the other." All the rats present loudly squealed assent, and slapped their tails in applause. The meeting adjourned and the rats retired to their homes, but the dovastations of the trap being by no means diminished, the rats were forced to call another "convention." The elders just assembled, had commenced their deliberations, when all were startled by a faint voice, and a poor rat with only three legs, limping into the ring, stood up to speak. All were instantly silent; stretching out the bleeding remains of his leg, he said, "My friends, I have tried the method, and you see the result! Now let me suggest a plan to escape the trap—Do not touch it."

How to Measure an Acre.—Land; 30 1-4 square yards make a square rod; 4 square rods one square rood; 4 square roods make one acre; 640 sacres make one square mile; 4,840 square yards or 160 rods make an acre. In measuring an acre by yards, the usual practice is to trace off 70 yards in length and 70 yards in width; this in a rough way may be considered near enough for practical purposes, but as 70 yards either way make 4,900 square yards, it exceeds one acre by 60 square yards. To determine an accurate acre, it should be measured 70 yards in length by 66 1-7 yards in breadth. The same result may be arrived at by measuring 220 feet in length and 198 feet in width, or by measuring 73 1-3 yards in length by 66 yards in breadth. [American Farmer

Poetry springeth from truth, as leaves from the tree: and, as the tree survives the loss of its leaves, so truth liveth without poetry; but, on the other hand, poetry when separated from truth soon fadeth, as the leaf that is torn from its tree.

DeRuyter Institute.

THE Academic Year of this Seminary, for 1850 and '51, will commence the third Wednesday in August, and continue forty-four weeks, including a short recess between the terms, and one of ten days for the winter holidays.

The year is divided into three terms:—

The first, of 14 weeks, begins Wednesday, August 21st, and ends Wednesday, November 27th.

The second, of 15 weeks, begins Monday, December 2d, and ends Friday, March 14th.

The third, of 14 weeks, begins Tuesday, March 18th, and ends Tuesday, June 24th.

Board of Instruction.

GURDON EVANS, A. M., President,
And Professor of Mathematics and Natural Science.
Rev. JOSEPH W. MORTON,
Professor of Hebrew, Greek, Latin, French, Spanish, and Moral and Intellectual Science.
Mrs. SUSANNA M. SPICER, Preceptress.
ADOLPH ROSENHAYN,
(Late of Friedrick Wilhelm College, Berlin,)
Teacher of German, Piano Forte, and Assistant in Greek and Latin.

Other competent Teachers will be employed as occasion may demand.

TEACHERS' CLASSES will be formed, as usual, at the beginning of the Fall and middle of the Winter Terms, and continue seven weeks.

In the Common Branches, classes will be formed at the commencement of each term; but in the higher, the interest of the student, as well as the welfare of the Institution, demand that a more systematic course of study be pursued.

In the Natural Sciences, Elementary Chemistry and Philosophy will be pursued during the Fall Term; Agricultural Chemistry, Astronomy, and Physiology during the Winter Term; Botany and Geology during the Summer Term.

Classes will be formed in Latin, French, and German, at the commencement of the Fall Term; in Hebrew, Greek, and Spanish, at the commencement of the Winter Term, and continue through the course of study.

In Mathematics, Geometry is studied in the Fall, Trigonometry and Conic Sections in the Winter, and Astronomy, Surveying, Navigation, &c., in the Summer Term.

The course of instruction in Agriculture is thorougly scientific, embracing study and recitation in the best authors. Instruction is given in a well-furnished laboratory, in the analysis of soils, ashes of plants, manures, &c. and the modes of testing for their constituent elements. The attention of farmers who wish to give their sons a practical education is especially called to this department.

Board in private families, from $1 25 to $1 50. Many students board in clubs for 60 to 75 cents.

Tuition—to be settled upon entering school—from $3 00 to $5 00. Extras—For Drawing, $1 00; Oil Painting, $5 00; Chemical Experiments, $1 00; Writing, including stationery, 50 cents; Piano Forte, $8 00; Use of Instrument, $2 00; Agricultural Chemistry, including chemicals, apparatus, and fuel, (breakage extra,) $12 00.

It is very desirable that students should enter at the beginning of the term; yet they are received into classes already formed at any time.

For farther information, address Gurdon Evans, J. W. Morton, or Rev. J. R. Irish, President of the Corporation.

THE FUGITIVE SLAVE BILL.

Such is the title of an act of legislation having undoubted title to preëminence in all that might characterize the legislation of the darkest periods of man's history. The statute books of the blackest night of Algerine piracy, or Russian despotism, can scarcely produce a parallel. The world at this moment shudders at so unprecedented a development of unrelenting hatred. But, although its magnitude of iniquity has insulted the common intelligence of the universe, and aroused the slumbering sympathies of man, it does not burst upon the world as a single specimen of an unknown genus. It is the climax of that iniquitous system of jurisprudence, which our government has been fabricating for more than half a century. Acts of a kindred character, yet wanting in the quantity of its essential characteristic, might be enumerated to fill a volume. * * *

This bill claims paternity far back in the history of American legislation. It professes to be, "An Act to amend, and supplementary to an Act entitled, 'An Act respecting fugitives from justice, and persons escaping from the service of their masters,' approved February twelfth, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-three."

This Act, commonly known as the Act of 1793, claims to have sprung from the Constitution itself. So this miserable burlesque on all human legislation, claims to be a grandchild of that noblest and purest specimen of consistent and godlike legislation that ever blessed the human kind. What a caricature on the universal law of nature, that "like begets like!" What an insult to the shades of Washington, and his noble compatriots, who watered the infant Constitution with their blood, having planted it deep in a soil consecrated to freedom!

The essential feature of the original Act, is to authorize the individual claiming property in man, to seize that man, with or without process, and drag him before some Justice of the Peace of his own choice; and, upon such claimant making oath before said Justice that the person seized is his slave, said Justice is bound to deliver him to the claimant. The trial by jury was suspended by that Act; but the right of retention by writ of habeas corpus, that his case might be adjudicated, was preserved. The claimant was also liable to an action for false imprisonment, in case his claim proved fraudulent. Such were the general features of the Act of 1793; bad enough, surely!

The first defect found in this Act by the keen-sighted legislators existed in the paucity of authorized slave-catchers. There were usually only three Justices of the Peace in a town throughout the Northern States, and it was quite evident that a swift-footed fugitive might pass them, if not highly endowed with nasal susceptibilities. The new Act supplies this defect by authorizing the appointment of Commissioners by the Circuit Courts of the United States. The number of Commissioners is discretionary with the Courts appointing; so that one of these legal blood-hounds may be stationed at every school district, and even at every house, if the owner would allow his swarthy visage to prowl around that spot consecrated to social endearments.

The authority of these licensed men-catchers is almost unbounded, while they are responsible for the exercise of that authority to no higher tribunal this side the eternal judgment. Their authority is both judicial and executive. They are authorized each one of them to issue warrants, "which shall run and be executed any where within the State in which they are issued." All the marshals and deputy marshals of the United States are commanded, under penalty of one thousand dollars, to execute the warrants thus issued. But lest there should be a scarcity of marshals and deputies, these commissioners are empowered to appoint any number of "suitable persons to execute all such warrants and processes as may be issued by them," and said suitable persons to be empowered to summon a posse commitatus of the bystanders to aid in the arrest of the victim. Oh, my God, what a spectacle! A pack of despicable men, authorized both to pursue God's image as if it were a prowling hyena, and to beget another pack in their own fiendish likeness, to yelp on the bloody track of bruised humanity; and this pack of sub-blood-hounds, clothed with authority to summon the entire population to their aid in this nefarious business. "And all good citizens are hereby commanded to aid and assist in the prompt and efficient execution of this law, whenever their services may be required as aforesaid for that purpose!" What a consummation of all that smells of the fumes of Orcus! What a burlesque on all enlightened legislation! What a misconception of the character of all good citizens, to command them to aid such miscreants in so unhallowed a work!

But this power extends not only to the issuing of warrants, and arresting of victims, but this same commissioner is both judge and jury in the case. The trembling victim appears before him who holds his dearest rights at his disposal, and, accountable to no authority for such disposal, he dooms him to hopeless bondage, and that upon testimony of which he alone is judge as to its validity. No Jury can sit empaneled to weigh the testimony in the balance of unprejudiced deliberation. No Judge sits upon the bench, versed in the technicalities of law, and competent to determine the bearings of the law in the case. The party accused is forbidden to testify, and of course can procure no testimony. What a scene in a land of law! In that room where the momentous question of human liberty is to be tried, sits the trembling prisoner, by that trial to be lifted up to the blessings of liberty, or thrust down to the bitter woes of slavery. What a measureless value at stake!—a value outweighing worlds. Who are there to decide this question, big with interests reaching through eternity, which might well summons the erudition and virtue of the world? Alas for humanity! Who? The slaveholder, whose bloody hand has often wielded the cutting lash over the victim he has pursued, bearing an affidavit from some one at the South as false to God and humanity as himself, and this Commissioner, his soulless tool—these two constitute the legal tribunal at which human freedom must appear for adjudication. What a forlorn hope for liberty! A merciless slaveholder for a prosecutor—the affidavit brought by him from another as mean as himself for testimony—and this sympathizing commissioner for judge and jury—and he bribed by the proffer of five dollars to deliver the victim up! By the provisions of the act, he is to receive ten dollars fee if he delivers the accused to the accuser, but only five if he does not deliver him. I had rather entrust my liberty in the hands of the bloodiest pirate that ever infested the high seas, than in the hands of such a tribunal. And yet such is the tribunal which this nation has set up for the adjudication of human rights, and by it freemen are almost every day being consigned to hopeless bondage. When this mock Judge has tried the case, which in some instances occupies less than an hour, he consigns the prisoner to the claimant, with a certificate, which forestalls the action of any court whatever in the United States in behalf of the accused, and with authority to employ the whole military force of the United States to convey that poor fugitive back to bondage. But if all this should fail to carry him safe to his master's plantation, and with or without the marshal's consent he should escape, this Act makes said marshal liable to the claimant in the value of the slave.

This Act has not left one single barrier around human freedom. In the first place, any individual may be seized without process, and dragged before a tribunal more detestable than ever before stole the sacred name of Justice. From this there is no appeal. Our County Courts, State Supreme Courts, and the Supreme Court of the United States, all, all are closed, and this little tool of tyrants makes a decision which even the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States cannot annul. In controversies involving the value of a pig, all this array of judicial tribunals is open, and a quarter of a century may be employed in the investigation. But when an immortal soul is involved, a single hour suffices, and that before the lowest tribunal on earth, without appeal, without jury, without habeas corpus to stay the execution of a sentence as dreadful as ever fell on mortal man!

And is this Act the legitimate progeny of that Constitution which declares, that "no person shall be deprived of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law?" It denies every element of a "due process of law." Is this Act the offspring of a Constitution that guaranties a trial by jury, in all cases where the value in controversy exceeds twenty dollars, and in all criminal cases? This it denies. Is it the offspring of a Constitution declaring that "the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus shall not be suspended unless in cases of rebellion or invasion?" It forbids this privilege, while it authorizes the very personal violence which this writ was instituted to prevent. Oh, how would a Constitution formed for the express purpose to "secure the blessings of LIBERTY," blush to own such an offspring! As soon would a sweet fountain pour forth bitter waters, or a pure heart send forth corrupt communications.

But this Act not only reaches its scaly fingers into the sanctum of the fugitive, but it also invades the sacred rights of the free people of the North. It compels the Marshal, under a penalty of a thousand dollars, to accept and execute the warrant of the Commissioner and others authorized to issue warrants. It imposes a fine of a thousand dollars, and six months imprisonment, together with a thousand dollars damage, if any one shall in any way, directly or indirectly, aid or abet the escape of a fugitive. It forbids to oppose any obstructions to the capture of a fugitive, with or without process; and, in short, it forbids the exercise of all those feelings of benevolence which make the gospel of Christ worth possessing. To give a cup of cold water to a thirsty, panting child of God, is forbidden. To shelter him from the pitiless storm is forbidden. To be a Christian is forbidden. But to be blood-hounds—to bark on the track of our bleeding brother, at the nod of petty, irresponsible, and wicked emissaries of a government at war with Heaven—this is enjoined.

Such are the essential features of this Act. Shall it be obeyed? It may be deemed the height of impiety to question the duty to obey the powers that be. To those who repudiate the doctrine of a "higher power," it may be impiety. But with those who recognize the authority of God, disobedience to this Act is the highest virtue; for it is not surer that God is the rightful sovereign of the universe, than that this Act forbids what he enjoins, and enjoins what he forbids. "Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself," is the whole duty of man to his fellow-man. This duty is most impiously forbidden by this blasphemous Act; and since no man can love God who loves not his neighbor, it follows that it forbids obedience to both tables of the Decalogue, which embrace the entire duty of man. God seems to delight in affording opportunities to distinguish the hypocrite from the true Christian. "Choose ye this day whom ye will serve," is as appropriate an injunction to day as it was four thousand years ago. Nor was obedience to the false gods of the heathen, a surer indication of hatred to the true God, than will be obedience to this false god, on the part of any who shall so far forget his humanity, and his christianity, as to obey it. What is the prompting of our holy religion, when the poor victim represented in the parable of the Samaritan, having been robbed, and bruised, and beaten, till more than half dead, has crawled to our door, and besought shelter from the pitiless storm, and from thieves more pitiless than the storm? Shall he have a cup of cold water—a mouthful of food? Shall he be warmed and sheltered? There never was a plainer duty. "Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself," cannot be evaded—it is exactly in point. There can be no alternative. At that moment there must be a choice whom to serve. Can the Christian turn that poor suppliant away unblessed, and then look up to Heaven for a blessing? As well might Cain have knelt on the mangled body of his murdered brother, and called on God for a blessing.

But we are not only forbidden thus to show mercy to God's image, but are commanded to aid in seizing and dragging that poor suppliant back to the tender mercies of the thieves who have stripped him, and bruised him. Did our legislators expect us to obey this injunction? What an estimate of our manhood, and our christianity! Where is the miscreant to do this deed, the thoughts of which might well burn the face of Satan to cinders with blushes. Such a wretch would be spurned from the face of an honest man, as a venomous reptile. Paul and Silas are in heaven, but their mantles have fallen, we hope, on a host who, like them, dare to despise the puny arm of enthroned injustice, and obey the living God. Let the furnace be heated seven times hotter than is wont, and the sound of dulcimer and harp ring in the ears of men; this great image shall stand unworshiped by all true devotees at the shrine of the God of Shadrack, Meshech, and Abednego. Let growling lions be unloosed; the spirit of Daniel lives, and the God of Heaven lives, who will speedily write on the walls of this great Babylon, "Mene, Mene, Tekel, Upharsin."

This Act is a double nullity—for, 1st. It is at war with every precept of the Divine Law; and, 2d. It is at war with every precept of our Constitution, as we have shown. Now, if we admit, as is claimed by the Belshazzars and false Daniels of this nation, that the Constitution of the United States is the paramount rule of action, both for God and men, still we pronounce this Act a nullity, for the reason, that it tramples the plainest provisions of that document in the dust. It belies the expressed intentions of its founders, and insults their sleeping dust. We love law, and will obey it, but this despicable Act is not law, and we will not obey it. The power exists not this side of Omnipotence, that can compel us. We can and will enjoy its heaviest penalties, and the damp dungeon shall hear our praise to God. But the poor slave shall find shelter under our roof; he shall be fed, and shall be clothed, and the miscreant that shall dare to seek him there, shall find the strength of freemen's arms.

LIVING IN HEARTS.

It is better to live in hearts than in houses. A change of circumstances or a disobliging landlord may turn one out of a house to which he has formed many attachments. Removal from place to place is, with many, an unavoidable incident of life. But one cannot be expelled from a true and loving heart save by his own fault—nor yet always by that, for affection clings tenaciously to its object in spite of ill-desert; but go where he will, his home remains in hearts which have learned to love him; the roots of affection are not torn out and destroyed by such removals, but they remain fixed deep in the heart, clinging still to the image of that object which they are evermore eager to clasp. When one revisits the home of his childhood, or the place of his happy abode in life's spring-time, pleasant as it is to survey each familiar spot, the house, the garden, the trees planted by himself or by kindred now sleeping in the dust, there is in the warm grasp of the hand, in the melting of the eye, in the kind and earnest salutation, in the tender solicitude for the comfort and pleasure of his visit, a delight that no mere local objects of nature and art, no beautiful cottage, or shady rill, or quiet grove, can possibly bestow. To be remembered, to be loved, to live in hearts, this is our solace amid earthly changes, this our joy above all the pleasures of scene and place. We love this spiritual home feeling—this union of hearts which death cannot destroy; for it augurs—if there be heart-purity as well as heart-affection—an unchanging and imperishable abode in hearts now dear. THE OLDEST HYMN.

In Paed. Lib. III. of Clement of Alexandria, is given (in Greek) the most ancient hymn of the Primitive Church. It is then (one hundred and fifty years after the Apostles,) asserted to be of much earlier origin. It may have been sung by the "beloved disciple" before he ascended to his reward. The following version will give some imperfect idea of its spirit:—

Shepherd of tender youth!
Guiding, in love and truth,
Through devious ways;
Christ, our triumphant King;
We come thy name to sing,
And here our children bring,
To shout thy praise.

Thou art wisdom's High Priest!
Thou hast prepared the feast
Of holy love;
And in our mortal pain,
None calls on thee in vain,
Help thou dost not disdain,

Thou art our holy Lord!
The all-subduing word!
Healer of strife!
Thou didst thyself abase,
That from sin's deep disgrace,
Thou mightest save our race,
And give us life!

Ever be thus our guide!
Our Shepherd and our pride,
Our staff and song!
Jesus! thou Christ of God!
By thy perennial word,
Lead us where thou hast trod,
Make our faith strong.

So now, and till we die,
Sound we thy praises high,
And joyful sing.
Infants, and the glad throng,
Who to thy church belong,
Unite and swell the song,
To Christ our King.

A NATION WITHOUT GOD.

I know—I sigh when I think of it—that hitherto the French people have been the least religious of all the nations of Europe. Is it because the idea of God—which arises from all the evidences of Nature, and from the depths of reflection, being the profoundest and weightiest idea of which human intelligence is capable, and the French mind being the most rapid, but the most superficial, the lightest, the most unreflective of all the European races—has not the force and severity necessary to carry far and long the greatest conception of the human understanding? Is it because we are and have been a military people, a soldier nation, led by kings, heroes, ambitious men, from battle-field to battle-field, making conquests and never keeping them, ravaging, dazzling, charming, and corrupting Europe, and bringing home the manners, vices, lightness, and impiety of the camp to the fireside of the people? I know not; but certain it is, that the nation has an immense progress to make in serious thought if she wishes to remain free.

If we look at the characters, compared as regards religious sentiment, of the great nations of Europe, America, and even Asia, the advantage is not for us. The great men of other countries live and die on the scene of history, looking up to Heaven—our great men appear to live and die, forgetting completely the only idea for which it is worth living and dying—they live and die looking at the spectator; or, at most, posterity.

Open the history of America, the history of England, and the history of France; read and compare the great lives, the great deaths, the great martyrdoms, the great words at the hour when the ruling thought of life reveals itself in the last words of the dying.

Washington and Franklin fought, spoke, suffered, ascended and descended in their political life of popularity, in the ingratitude of glory, in the contempt of their fellow-citizens—always in the name of God, for whom they acted. The Liberator of America died, confiding to God the liberty of the people, and his own soul!

Strafford, who died for the constitution of his country, wrote to Charles I., to entreat him to consent to his execution, in order to prevent political troubles; after this consent was obtained, he wrote—"Put not your confidence in princes, nor your trust in the sons of men, for salvation cometh not from them, but from on high."

On his way to the scaffold, he stopped under the window of his friend the Bishop of London; he raised his head towards him, and asked his prayers in the terrible moment that awaited him. The aged prelate burst into tears, and giving his trembling benediction, fell senseless into the arms of those who surrounded him.

Strafford went on his way, strengthened by the Divine influence, invoked by the venerable man, and spoke in calmness to the people assembled to see him die. "I only fear one thing," said he, "it is, that this is an unhappy presage for my country—this effusion of innocent blood. I am now at the end—one stroke will make a widow of my wife, orphans of my children, will deprive my servants of an affectionate master, will separate me from my poor brother, and my friends. May God replace all to them."

He undressed, and laying his head on the block, said, "I thank my Heavenly Master for enabling me to await this blow without fear, for not permitting me to be dismayed by an instant of terror. I lay down my head on this block with as much composure as I ever laid it down to sleep."

Behold faith in union with patriotism. Look at Charles I. in his turn, that model of the death of a king. At the moment of receiving the stroke of the axe, whose edge he examined, he raised his head, and said to the minister who attended him, "Remember!" That is, remember to tell my sons never to avenge the death of their father.

Sidney, the young martyr of patriotism, guilty of nothing but impatience, and who died to expiate his country's dream of liberty, said to his jailor, "I rejoice that I die innocent towards the king, but a victim resigned to the King on high, to whom all life is due."

The Republicans of Cromwell only sought the way of God, even in the blood of battles. Their politics were their faith—their reign a prayer—their death a psalm. One hears, sees, feels that God was in all the movements of these great people.

But cross the seas, traverse La Mancha, come to our times, open our annals, and listen to the last words of the great political actors of the drama of our liberty. One would think that God was eclipsed from the soul; that His name was unknown in the language. History will have the air of an athiest when she recounts to posterity these annihilations, rather than deaths, of celebrated men in the greatest year of France! The victims only have a God; the tribunes and victors have none.

Look at Mirabeau on the bed of death: "Crown me with flowers," said he, "intoxicate me with perfumes. Let me die to the sound of deilcious music." Not a word of God, or of his soul. Sensual philosopher, he desired only a supreme sensualism, a last voluptuousness to his agony.

Contemplate Madame Roland, the strong-hearted woman of the Revolution, on the cart that conveyed her to death. She looked contemptuously on the besotted people who killed their prophets and sybils. Not a glance towards Heaven! Only one word for the earth she was quitting—"O, liberty!"

Approach the dungeon door of the Girondists. Their last night is a banquet. The only hymn, the Marseillaise!

Follow Camille Desmoulins to his execution. A cool and indecent pleasantry at the trial, and a long imprecation on the road to the guillotine, were the two last thoughts of this dying man on his way to the last tribunal.

Hear Danton on the platform of the scaffold, at the distance of a line from God and eternity. "I have had a good time of it; let me go to sleep." Then to the executioner, "You will show my head to the people; it is worth the trouble!" His faith, annihilation; his last sigh, vanity; behold the Frenchman of this later age!

What must one think of the religious sentiment of a free people whose great figures seem thus to march in procession to annihilation, and to whom that terrible minister, Death itself, recalls neither the threatenings nor the promises of God!

The Republic of these men without a God has quickly been stranded. The liberty won by so much heroism and so much genius has not found in France a conscience to shelter it, a God to avenge it, a people to defend it against that atheism which has been called glory! An atheistic republicanism cannot be heroic. When you terrify it, it bends; when you would buy it, it sells itself. It would be very foolish to immolate itself. Who would take any heed? the people ungrateful, and God non-existent! So finish atheist revolutions! [Lamartine.

HAYTI.

From the Boston Journal.

We had the pleasure, recently, of conversing with a gentleman of Port-au-Prince, a Haytien citizen, who is now on a visit to this country, and were much interested in his statements respecting that empire. From these statements it is evident that the general impressions of our people in regard to the local difficulties which for the few past years have distracted that nation, have been founded upon an imperfect knowledge of the causes, and are, therefore, to a considerable degree, erroneous. The statements of the gentleman alluded to, who for thirty-two years has been a resident of Port-au-Prince, and intimately acquainted and connected with the political affairs of the nation, place the conduct of the Emperor Soulouque in a more favorable position than we have been wont to regard it.

The gentleman contends that the affairs of Hayti, notwithstanding her internal commotions, have been, on the whole, conducted better than many of the South American States. Such was the case under Boyer as President, and is now under Soulouque as Emperor, supported by a standing army. He states that the movement of Soulouque in assuming the powers of Emperor, was a conservative movement to preserve order and peace to the nation. With a Republican Government, upon the death of the President there were from fifty to sixty aspirants for that office, ready to involve the country in civil war to sustain their claims. The ideas of the people generally, in regard to Republican Governments and institutions, are not in accordance with the Republicanism of America, but are of the Red Republican school of France. The gazettes and papers are of that class. When Soulouque was elected President, the rabble, imbued with these ideas, and under the direction of designing leaders, endeavored to carry them into practice. Surrounded by such men, some of whom were associated with him in the councils of the nation, the action of the President was necessarily cramped and swayed from the course he wished to pursue, to suit the emergency in which he found himself placed. His policy has been to free himself from the influence and embarrassments of those men, and he has in a great degree done it, though in some instances not without very decided and summary action.

The gentleman states that the more intelligent portion of the population are earnestly in favor of elevating the condition of the people generally. As an evidence of this, he mentions that one great cause of complaint under Boyer's administration was the neglect to establish the requisite means for the education of the people. In Boyer's time there was founded a Lancastrian School, a little distance from Port-au-Prince, which is still in existence; but it was not until after the expiration of his term of office that Primary Schools were introduced by the Government.

Our informant expressed the belief that Soulouque was disposed to restore order and quiet throughout his dominions—to encourage agriculture and all business which would tend to develop the resources of the Island. Even under all the difficulties which have been experienced, the agriculture of the Island has not been neglected. The culture of Coffee, and other staple productions and vegetables, has been continued with no sensible diminution in the crops. In this connection, our informant alluded to the longevity of the coffee-tree and sugar cane in the Island, in consequence of the superiority of the soil, when compared with those cultivated at Jamaica and other of the West India Islands. In Hayti the coffee shrub will last, with proper care and attention, for fifty years, without sensible depreciation, while in other islands it requires to be re-planted in a few years.

In spite of all her bad government, Hayti has been, and still is, rich in her productions, and the trade to that Island is valuable to this country; for some of her implements of industry, all her building materials, and in fact for the greater part of the necessaries of this life, she is dependent upon and purchases them of the United States. Her near proximity to this country renders it natural for her to look hither for a supply of those articles which are required to supply the wants of her population, numbering about 1,000,000. Among the articles specified, for which there is a large demand, our informant mentions that the coarser kinds of cotton goods sent from this country, are preferred to those of English manufacture, and are more readily disposed of. There is one article, however, in the manufacture of which we, as yet, have not been able to compete with the English, and that is, the article of checks, for the use of the common population, large quantities of which are required to meet the demand. When we shall become able to manufacture this article so as to compete in quality and cheapness with the English manufacturer, a very important addition to our trade with the Island will be made.

This gentleman mentioned one fact in this connection, which is worth repeating, viz: that while in all other implements of husbandry the English are believed to surpass us, in the manufacture of the axe we are decidedly ahead of them. He states that the American axe is preferred there to the best of Birmingham manufacture, and is sold at a cheaper rate. He also stated a fact with which we were not conversant, that American axes had been sent to Liverpool, and there sold in competition with the English article.

Our informant further states that a friendly feeling exists among the Haytiens toward Americans, although there has been and is much to alienate those feelings. It is, in some cases, for the interest of the white resident there to tell as bad a story about Hayti as he can—and this has been done with a prejudicial result to the Haytiens. Then there is the English influence, which is not favorable to a government of blacks. Beside this, the conduct of our Commissioner, Mr. Green, who was recently sent there to adjust certain difficulties, was such as to prejudice the people against this country and Government. His bearing toward the Emperor is described as being ungentlemanly and insolent, such as gave great offense, and reflected dishonor upon the Government whose accredited agent he was.

Another interesting item of intelligence was communicated to us, viz. that there is now in course of publication, from the pen of a native Haytien, a history of the Island, from its discovery to the present time. The history is written in the French language, and will be published in three large volumes, two of which have already been issued. Negotiations are being made to have a translation of the work published in this country. We trust this will be done, as we are assured the facts therein stated will correct many errors now existing relative to the political history of the nation, and that it will also contain a large amount of valuable information in regard to the resources and capabilities of the Island.

EXPERIENCE OF ANDREW FULLER.

In March, 1770, I witnessed the baptizing of two young persons, (having never seen that ordinance administered before,) and was considerably affected by what I saw and heard. The solemn immersion of a person, on a profession of faith in Christ, carried such conviction with it, that I wept like a child on the occasion. The words of the Psalmist, in Psalm 111: 10, "A good understanding have all they that do his commandments," left a deep and abiding impression on my mind. I was fully persuaded, that this was the primitive way of baptizing, and that every Christian was bound to attend to this institution. About a month after this, I was baptized myself, and joined the church at Soham, being then turned of sixteen years of age.

Within a day or two after I had been baptized, as I was riding through the fields, I met a company of young men. One of them, especially, on my having passed them, called after me in very abusive language, and cursed me for having been "dipped." My heart instantly rose in a way of resentment; but though the fire burned, I held my peace; for, before I uttered a word, I was checked with this passage, which occurred to my mind:—"In the world ye shall have tribulation." I wept, and entreated the Lord to pardon me; feeling quite willing to bear the ridicule of the wicked, and to go even through great tribulation, if at last I might but enter the kingdom. In this tender frame of mind I rode some miles, thinking of the temptations I might have to encounter. Amongst others, I was aware of the danger of being drawn into any acquaintance with the other sex, which might prove injurious to my spiritual welfare. While poring over these things, and fearful of falling into the snares of youth, I was led to think of that passage, "In all thy ways acknowledge him, and he shall direct thy paths." This made me weep for joy; and, for forty-five years, I have scarcely entered on any serious engagement without thinking of these words, and entreating divine direction.

The Sabbath Recorder.

New York, November 14, 1850.

"DESTINY OF THE WICKED."

To the Editors of the Sabbath Recorder :—

In reading your articles on the Destiny of the Wicked, I find you have discovered that "the unskillful rantings of some preachers depict the final state of sinners in such a light" as to reflect "on the goodness and benevolence of the Divine Being." Your reason justly bolts at the idea of sinners being "thrust down into some lake of material fire," there to writhe on the billows of damnation to all eternity. But what do you do? Do you turn to the Bible to see what God has revealed on this subject? No; you go to work and conjure up a hell of your own, where "the ligitimate fruit of unsubdued enmity against God" is the punishment of sin. "The cause existing," you say, "the effect necessarily follows." The enmity, then, and "the hated presence of the Holy One," is the "very climax of his misery." Sinners seem to be well enough suited with this "effect" of sin in this life, and why not in another? (1.) The most hardened sinner would take the most comfort in such a hell. You say, "It is the natural and necessary result of the workings of his own enmity. God needs to do nothing more than to leave him just as he is; that makes hell enough for him." What nonsense!—to confound the penalty of sin with sin itself. (2.) But, say you, sinners will also suffer "the positive tokens of divine wrath." What these tokens of divine wrath are, you have not informed us; but I conclude they are rather harmless, since "God needs to do nothing" like the exercise of "physical power," and the sinner had "hell enough" before. (3.)

Brother, come back to the Bible. All this fog arises out of the pagan notion, that man is a double entity; and that the soul is an immaterial, immortal nothing, that fire and brimstone cannot touch. Does the Bible say man has an immortal soul? No. If man has such a soul, why are we not told of it in the account of the creation? Surely we ought to be informed concerning the noblest part of man—the man himself. But the record says, "God formed MAN of the dust of the ground, and breathed into his nostrils the breath of life; and man became a living soul;" (Hebrew, living being.) God told this living soul, that if he sinned he should die. He sinned; and the following sentence was pronounced against him: "In the sweat of thy face shalt thou eat bread, till thou return unto the ground; for out of it wast THOU taken; for dust thou art, and unto dust shalt thou return." But what about the "immortal soul"—the pagan man proper? Nothing! (4.) Now, if returning to dust is annihilation, the Bible teaches the doctrine. But you say, "The advocates of this doctrine are therefore driven to the extremity of maintaining, that the soul does actually suffer annihilation at death; in other words, that the whole man dies—the soul as well as the body." (How many living beings does man consist of? and which was excepted in the threatening, "Thou shalt surely die?") You continue, "Death is regarded by them as an entire extinction of being. But if this be so, it is impossible to punish the wicked at all. For, if the thinking spirit in man be entirely extinguished at death, the resurrection of man to a new consciousness is the creation of a new conscious being. It is not the same conscious being who once deserved punishment." Here is a new argument against the resurrection of the dead; one that the Sadducees never thought of. "If a man die, shall he live again?" is a Bible question. Let this argument answer the question. "If a man dies, 'it is impossible' for him to live again; but if he does not die, he will live again." (5.)

The preachers you accuse of "unskillful rantings," are not alone in consigning the sinner to "some lake of fire." The Bible says, "All liars shall have their part in the lake which burneth with fire and brimstone." The difference between them and the Bible is this: The Bible says, "This is the second death;" they say, "This is eternal life in misery." The Bible says, (Jude 7,) "Sodom and Gomorrah are set forth as an example, suffering the vengeance of eternal fire." 2 Pet. 2: 6—"Making them an example unto those that after should live ungodly." Now, the case of those wicked men can be no example to us, farther than we have learned their history. What says the history? Does it say that God left them to "the workings of their own enmity," and also gave them "positive tokens of divine wrath?" Not quite so mild. "The Lord rained upon Sodom and upon Gomorrah brimstone and fire from the Lord out of heaven; and he overthrew those cities, and all the plain, and all the inhabitants of the cities, and that which grew upon the ground." (Gen. 19: 24.) "Turning the cities of Sodom and Gomorrah into ashes." (Peter.) This is their history, and they are set forth as an example. Were they burned to ashes? They were. Was the fire eternal and unquenchable? It was. Is it still burning? It is not; it accomplished its work and ceased to burn.

You say, "In God's presence he (the sinner) must forever remain." How does this agree with the Scripture, "Who shall be punished with everlasting destruction from the presence of the Lord, and from the glory of his power?" (6.) Brother, abandon heathen fables, and come to the Bible, and all is plain and straight. There God vindicates his own benevolence.

Yours in hope of eternal life,
ROSWELL F. COTTRELL.

Remarks.

(1.) This is a mistake. "Sinners are not "well enough suited with this effect of sin in this life." The fact is, that in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred, they experience little or nothing of this "effect" till they pass into the eternal world. Their time and attention are so completely occupied with the objects of sense, that they do not stop to consider how they feel towards God. As soon as they are satisfied with one object, they go immediately in quest of another, and then of another, and so on; thus filling up the measure of their existence on earth in trying to obtain pleasure from the things which they can see, hear, taste and feel. It is not till they are cut off from all farther communication with such things, that the enmity of their hearts begins to rage. Then they begin to reflect upon the life they have led. They have no opportunity for any thing else but reflection. They reflect that they have, by leading such a life, violated the law of God. They feel that the claims of that law still lie upon them. But, being still unsanctified in heart, they are unwilling to yield, and are only maddened by having such restraints laid upon them. Their unsubdued enmity rages like the troubled sea, and the natural consequence is, that they are miserable. They have a hell raging within them. Sinners would be just as miserable in this life, were it not that this material world, with its ten thousand objects of sense, is continually attracting their attention, taking up their time, and so filling their hearts that no room is left for any consideration of the relation in which they stand to their Creator. Yet there are cases of partial development of this result even in this life. Witness those miserable wretches who have grown weary of the world, who have worn out their lives blaspheming the name of Jesus Christ, and are, at last, sufficiently awake to see themselves abandoned of God. Paine was keenly miserable before he left this world. Voltaire had the fire of hell burning within him before he passed into the eternal state. Others of like spirit have been afraid to stay alone in the dark. Gibbs, a noted pirate, who was executed some dozen or more years ago in Boston, perpetrated a great part of his atrocities apparently without any motive. When asked why he did so, he replied, that it was "to avoid the horrors of reflection." He carried about so much of hell within his bosom, that he could render his existence tolerable only by plunging more deeply into that course, which gave him so much active business, that no time was left for reflection. But to say nothing of such God-abandoned creatures, do we not see something in the case of every awakened sinner to illustrate the truth of our position? What is the nature of the horrible distress which almost every one feels before giving up his heart to Christ? His misery is unutterable; it is like taking a sip from the very cup of the damned. The cause of it is his enmity. His rebellious spirit is not yet destroyed. The claims of the law and of the gospel are distinctly before him, but he is not yet able to yield. He has hard thoughts of God, thinks he is unnecessarily rigid, feels like persisting in his rebellion, and sometimes feels as if he could leap to heaven and tear the Almighty from his throne. Yet the exercise of such enmity does nothing to alleviate his wretchedness, but only increases it; thus giving him a fearful presage of what eternity will be to the enemies of God.

(2.) Another mistake. We did not say, that the enmity of the sinner's heart was the penalty of sin. If we recollect rightly, we said something about abandonment as being included in the penalty. Enmity itself may be no part of the penalty which the transgressor suffers, but the misery naturally resulting from such enmity may. When a man thrusts his hand into the fire, he violates a law of nature. The act of thrusting his hand into the fire is not the penalty which he suffers for this violation, but the pain resulting from it is. When God judicially abandons the sinner to the workings of his own enmity, that very abandonment is, in a certain sense, the execution of the penalty against him. The exercise of enmity is the sinner's own act, but the abandoning of him, so that his enmity may rage and render him miserable, is God's act. But if our correspondent will examine what we wrote with a little more care, we think he will discover that we set forth this view by way of vindicating the Divine Being from the charge of being wanting in benevolence, which some are inclined to bring against him. We thus proved, that the sinner must of necessity be miserable, independent of any arbitrary appointment of God to make him so. But we did not maintain, that this was the penalty proper annexed to the transgression of the divine law. We added, that the sinner would suffer "the positive tokens of divine wrath."

(3.) It is true, we "did not say, what these tokens of Divine wrath are;" but we now say, that we do not pretend to be wise above what is written. In some manner or form, that we do not understand, God will make the sinner feel his righteous indignation. If our correspondent will tell us in what mode divine wrath was impressed on the soul of our Lord Jesus Christ, when he was "made a curse for us," we shall be able to give him satisfaction. When Christ was in such agony, that "his sweat was, as it were, great drops of blood falling to the ground;" when he prayed to have the cup pass from him, if it were possible; and when, in his extremity, he complained that God had forsaken him; it is evident that he complained of something more than bodily pain—of something more, too, than the common infamy attached to hanging on a tree. He was then suffering, in the sinner's stead, the positive tokens of Divine wrath. He felt not that misery of soul which grows out of the workings of enmity, for he was perfectly free from sin. This element of the sinner's hell could not possibly have any place with him. Yet in some mysterious manner he suffered such anguish as no mortal on earth ever suffered. In some such mysterious manner will God, at last, inflict wrath upon the wicked.

(4.) All this about the immortality of the soul being a pagan doctrine, is much easier said than proved. If our brother wishes the proof that man consists of body and soul—"dust" and "spirit"—he is referred to Ecclesiastes 12: 7.

(5.) The very fact, that "if a man die, he shall live again," shows most conclusively, that death does not mean annihilation. It means simply the dissolution of the connection between soul and body, so that "the dust may return to the earth as it was, and the spirit to God who gave it." If death were the entire extinction of being, it would be impossible for the same man to live again.

(6.) When we said, that the sinner must forever remain in God's presence, we did not, of course, mean that he would be in his presence in the same sense that the righteous are. We meant that he would never be able to find a place, where the tokens of God's power and justice are not displayed. And with this agrees the Scripture. "Whither shall I go from thy Spirit? or whither shall I flee from thy presence? If I ascend up into heaven, thou art there; if I make my bed in hell, behold, thou art there." Ps. 139: 7, 8. The passage in 2 Thess. 1: 9, means, that from the presence of the Lord shall go forth the tokens of his wrath against those that know not God and obey not the gospel of ouy Lord Jesus Christ, which shall be to them an "everlasting destruction."

SABBATH SCHOOLS.

Some years since, two of our churches were nearly equal as to numbers, talents and circumstances. Neither of them had a minister. In the one, they started a Sabbath School, under rather discouraging circumstances, no one but an illiterate youth being sufficiently interested to take charge of it. He prayerfully took upon himself the solemn responsibility. God blessed his effort. In a short time parents and their children were deeply interested in "searching the scriptures," under his instruction. As might have been expected, prayer-meetings were soon established, and even juvenile prayer meetings. Many of the youth were hopefully converted, followed their Lord's example in baptism, united with the church, and are now its most efficient members. From the time that this Sabbath School was started until these children were baptized, they heard but very few gospel sermons. This mode of studying the Bible has been kept up, frequent additions have been made to the church, it has now a settled minister, and is heartily engaged in the benevolent operations of the day. All who are acquainted with this church, must admit, that its prosperity, (under the blessing of God,) is owing to its well-conducted Sabbath School.

But to the other church of which mention has been made. Its history is not at all encouraging. It has dwindled away, until it has but little more than a name. The children in its vicinity, who were from ten to fifteen years of age at its organization, have grown up and stepped upon the stage of action without the love of God in their hearts; and by their overwhelming numbers and mighty influence, they seem to have almost entirely swept holiness from the whole neighborhood. Some members of this church have doubtless joined the church triumphant; others have become discouraged, and emigrated to the far West; but few remain to witness that a church was ever planted there. They have no minister—no Sabbath School.

In this contrast we see the utility of Sabbath Schools. Some of us have witnessed even greater and better results from them than those here referred to. It cannot be denied, that at least some of our churches had their origin in Sabbath Schools.

Where are the young men and women to take charge of the youth of our denomination and of other denominations among us, and "expound unto them in all the Scriptures the things concerning" our Redeemer? Unless this be done, we have much to fear. If the children in the vicinity of our churches, do not outnumber their members, they will soon have the field—the places of influence—and what is true of the last church above mentioned, may be true of more, or even all whose condition is as theirs was.

INCREASE OF MISSIONARIES IN CHINA.—A letter from Rev. J. L. Shuck, a missionary at Shanghai, from the Southern Baptist Board, gives the following account of the increase of Protestant Missionaries in the Celestial Empire:—

"Nearly fifteen years have passed away since I became a missionary. On reaching China the country was closed. I smuggled my family on shore, and I found the Protestant missionaries in number, male and female, all told, to amount to six. At present I am thankful to be able to communicate to you the encouraging fact, that there are now seventy-five male Protestant missionaries in China, from the various evangelical denominations of America and Europe. The female missionaries are in number about fifteen less than the males. Of the above seventy-five, nineteen are at Shanghai, and seventeen are at Ningpo, and the other thirty-nine are divided between the ports of Foo Chow, Amoy, Canton, and Hong-kong. Among the above seventy-five, there are only thirteen Baptist missionaries. Other denominations, in England and America, are pouring their representatives into China, while the Baptists on both sides of the Atlantic remain fearfully remiss with regard to the thronging, perishing millions of this great land of heathenism."

AN INDIAN'S COMMENTS ON ENGLAND.—George Copway, the Indian Chief, now stopping in England, writes to the New York Tribune in the following strain:—

"The present topic of excitement, in different circles, is the Bull of Pope PIO NONO, establishing Episcopal Hierarchy in England, no doubt gratifying to the Puseyites, and yet much to the annoyance of the other party. I had very little idea of the sectarian feeling which every where prevails among the different denominations of Christians in this country. The Wesleyans have at this time a quarrel, which may be productive of much evil, but if the controversy is conducted in the right spirit, might be of some benefit to that body; but their weapons are made too much of brimstone and fire. I have seen meetings all over the kingdom, in cities and towns, railing against each other. The High and Low Church parties are at war with one another. The State Church in Scotland are making a stir. One Mr. Todd is imprisoned for not paying a few shillings to the tax which supports the supposed favored church and meetings were held in Edinburgh sympathizing with the gentleman incarcerated."

REVIVALS IN BAPTIST COLLEGES.—Within the past year, says the N. Y. Baptist Register, there have been revivals in several of these Institutions. In Lewisburg, Pa., last winter, there was a delightful refreshing; and a revival is in progress in the Mercer University, Penfield, Georgia. On the 8th of October, eight of the students were baptized. During the last term, several of the students in Howard College, Marion, Alabama, professed conversion. All the present term a weekly prayer-meeting has been kept up, and more than half of the students in the advanced classes are professors of religion. One fact specially noticed is, "that those who profess religious principle make the best students, to a degree that those only who have had to do with institutions of learning can conceive. While such are the results of denominational Institutions, we do not wonder," says the editor, "that Baptists all over the United States are waking up to their importance, and hastening to endow them."

NEW ROUTE TO CHINA.—A letter from Rev. J. L. Shuck to the N. Y. Recorder, says that the time is just at hand when there will be a regular and rapid communication between Shanghai and San Francisco. "You are aware of the efforts being now made to form a Company for the establishment of a line of steamers across the Pacific, between the United States and China. A line of sailing vessels has already been started, and within the past ten days, the 'Corsair' and the 'Dart' have both left Shanghai for San Francisco via the Sandwich Islands. God, by a glorious train of providences, is linking the most distant nations of the earth together, and the time is not far off when we shall witness a still more rapid and wider diffusion of the great principles of our holy religion."

MISSIONARY BALLOONS.—The Hong Kong Register publishes, under the title of "Suggestions to Missionaries," a very strange project, which consists in arranging the distribution of small publications of the Bible Society, and other religious tracts, over the whole surface of China, by means of balloons. Upon a calculation made of the weight of the tracts, each balloon could carry two thousand, which might be allowed to fall one by one, and at short intervals. Thus the Word of God would fall literally like a refreshing shower over the incredulous "Flowery Land."

PANORAMA OF PILGRIM'S PROGRESS.—One of the most remarkable and original artistic exhibitions ever got up, was opened at Washington Hall, No. 598 Broadway, N. Y., on Second-day evening last. It is a panoramic representation, by some of the first American painters, of Bunyan's Allegory of the Pilgrim's Progress. Among the scenes represented are the Wicket Gate, the Castle of Giant Despair, the Delectable Mountains, the Valley of the Shadow of Death, and the Celestial City.

ELECTION RESULTS.—The result of the election held in the State of New York last week is not certainly known at the time of writing this paragraph. The N. Y. Tribune of Second-day, Nov. 11, expresses the opinion that the Free School Law was sustained, although the vote is quite close. It also thinks that Hunt, the Whig candidate for Governor, is elected by about 1000 majority, and Blakely, the Whig candidate for Canal Commissioner, by about the same majority. The other Whig candidates, it apprehends, are defeated, though nothing can be certainly known till the official canvasses begin to come in. The same paper figures up the Legislature for 1851 as follows: Senate—17 Whigs, 15 Democrats. Assembly—(just chosen)—82 Whigs, 14 Democrats, 2 Independent. In New Jersey the Democrats swept the State by some 5000 majority.

SUNDAY EVENING CONCERTS IN NEW YORK.—Among the novelties of the day, should be noticed a series of Sunday Evening Concerts, now being given in New York by Madame Anna Bishop, assisted by a large number of opera singers and musicians. Tripler Hall is said to be crowded on these occasions at 50 cents a head. Who can wonder, considering what a fine time Sunday furnishes to get ready for these displays of fashion and foppery? "Straws show which way the wind blows." These concerts show how much regard for the Sunday there is in New York.

COST OF PUBLISHING A RELIGIOUS NEWSPAPER.—The Synod of New York and New Jersey have reported, that the New York Presbyterian, a religious newspaper, sold for $1,000 to the editor of the New York Evangelist, never had more than 2,200 subscribers, 600 of whom were ministers paying but $1 per year. The founder of the paper lost $6,000 by it in eight months. It was subsequently supported by subscriptions.

MISSIONARY SUCCESS IN BURMAH.—A letter from Rev. Mr. Beecher, of the Sandoway Baptist Mission, dated July 3, says that Tway Poh, one of the ordained Karens, had returned from a preaching tour in Burmah, having baptized one hundred and forty-five Karens. This number, added to those baptized by himself and Myat Kyau, makes in all three hundred and thirty four added to those churches since the first of January.

NOTICE.—The Corresponding Secretary of the Seventh-day Baptist Missionary Society gives notice, that he is about to resume the prosecution of his agency in behalf of the Shanghai Chapel, and that he expects (the Lord willing) to spend Sabbath, the 23d inst., in Brookfield, and the following Sabbath in Adams. He hopes that the brethren will be prepared for his coming.

RECEIPTS FOR BAPTIST MISSIONS.—It appears from the Macedonian, that the receipts of the American Baptist Missionary Union, from the 1st of April to the 30th of September, were $26,549 16, leaving over $98,000, or more than $16,000 a month, to be raised during six months, beginning the 1st of October, in order to meet the annual expenses authorized at the last meeting of the Board.

NEW MISSION TO JERUSALEM.—"The Church of the Disciples," better known as Campbellites, have recently appointed Dr. and Mrs. Barclay to establish a mission at Jerusalem. They took leave of their friends in Scottsville, Virginia, some five weeks ago.

A WINDFALL.—It is stated that a fortune of £400,062 currency has been left by the will of one Col. Daniels, lately deceased at Liverpool, England, to "a certain bookseller in Connecticut, the United States of America," whose name the testator did not remember. The will, however, specifies that the bookseller aforesaid kept a book-store south of the Tontine Hotel, New Haven, and in a large four or five story block, made of brick, having a bank in one of its divisions. "And my reason for this bequest is," continues the testator, "that the said bookseller showed me many marks of kindness and courtesy, and visited me during a sickness of several days. He was a married man, and a member of the English Church, and if now living, is about 40 years of age, or more." A codicil is added, that if this bequest cannot be complied with, for lack of proof, or by reason of the death of the legatee, the property, consisting of shares in the Banks of Liverpool, England, Dumfries, and Scotland, shall be divided between five persons named in the will. The question is, who is the fortunate man? Col. Daniels, it appears, was formerly a sojourner at New Haven during the summer months. [Tribune.

MESSAGE OF AN INDIAN CHIEF.—In the Cherokee Advocate of Oct. 12, says the N. Y. Tibune, we find the Message of John Ross, principal Chief of the Cherokee Nation, to the Legislature of his tribe. In brevity Mr. Ross's message might profitably serve as a model for Governors of the pale faces, or even for their great father at Washington. He laments the death of President Taylor, adding due moral reflections thereon, expresses peculiar regret at the death of Dr. Wm. Butler, late U. S. agent among the Cherokees, returns thanks to Divine Providence for the goodness of the crops, rejoices that peace and good order generally prevail in the nation, while he laments the growth of a class of intemperate and thieving characters, and proposes building a jail to correct them—suggests that the expenses of Government ought to be diminished, and thinks it indispensable that a census of the people be taken, in order that the appropriation lately made by the U. S. Government may be justly distributed—and all in but little more space than is occupied by this paragraph. Truly John Ross is a man of business and wastes no words.

General Intelligence.

Six Days Later from Europe.

The new steamship Africa arrived at New York on Sixth-day last, with Liverpool dates to Oct. 26th, London 25th, and Paris 24th.

In England, there is a great deal of excitement in connection with the late appointment of Catholic Archbishops and Bishops by the Pope. This distribution of England into Sees, and conferring of titles without authority by law, or previous negotiation with the Government, is regarded as improper and presumptuous, and the authorities are called upon not to permit it to be carried into execution. The tone with which the most ardent Protestants organs regard the matter, may be inferred from the following extract from the Morning Chronicle :—

Unquestionably, the matter is not one which can be allowed to sleep. A calm and serious inquiry must be instituted as to the best method of dealing with these absurd pretensions. Can any good reason be assigned why we should deal more leniently with these cases than we should do if the Emperor of Russia had assumed to confer on his Consul here the title of British Baron ? Already we forbid an Englishman from accepting even an order of knighthood from a foreign prince, unless permitted to do so by his own sovereign. The reason is obvious; it is both right and expedient that the Monarch should be the sole fountain of honor. But we now discern an actual rival. The Pope does not claim merely to confer an honorable rank or designation—he claims to give jurisdiction. He says to Dr. Wiseman : "I have certain subjects in England—go and govern them for me. They are to obey my orders and yours in the first place; after that, they may yield to the heretic Queen of the country such obedience as they find expedient, always remembering that I am the person who can save or condemn their souls, and that I am, therefore, the person to whom their chief allegiance must be paid."

In France, the difficulties long existing between Gen. Hautpoul, Minister of War, and Gen. Changarnier, Commander of the forces at Paris, has resulted in the dismissal of the former from office, he receiving the appointment of Gov. of Algeria by way of emollient. This event may be taken as an act of reconciliation between Louis Napoleon and the powerful Changarnier, in which the former gives in to the latter. The successor of D'Hautpoul is Gen. Schramm, a soldier of the Wars of Napoleon. He is said to be a person of great firmness and decision. Gen. Schramm had the glory of putting down an insurrection against Louis Phillippe in 1832, and commanded the army in Algeria before Marshal Buguead was sent there.

From Schleswig-Holstein there is no special news. A number of Austrian officers have joined the army of the Duchies. The latter rejoice at the approach of winter, and regard every day as so much gained. The army has published an address of thanks to the young woman of Arolsen, a town in the Waldeckerlande. The address commends not only the patriotic industry of these girls, which has produced stockings for the soldiers in the camp, and lint for the hospitals, as well as saleable articles for the bazaars and lotteries established to increase the funds of the Schleswig Holsteiners, but the self-denial which has led them to forego customary articles of diet, in order to be able to lay by the amount saved, as an offering on the altar of freedom.

From Italy, a document of some importance has appeared in the Papal Bull creating the new bishoprics in England. It is dated Sept. 29, and speaks of England as if it were a Catholic country. It recites that it is the earnest desire and aim of the Roman Pontiff to extend Catholicity, and to "reconvert the English nation," especially by the foreign education of devout young English Catholics, who, when brought up in the Propaganda College in their ecclesiastical calling, might return to their native land, and there propagate the true faith. The Pope, considering the present state of Catholicism in England, and the number of persons daily converted, judges it proper to recall the vicars apostolic, and a complete episcopal hierarchy is established.

In China, a serious rebellion has broken out, of which the Overland China Mail gives the following details :—

"The province of Kwangsi is at present the theater of a serious outbreak, but whether on the part of the unsubdued tribes or of the banditti who infest its borders, is not very clearly ascertained. There is no doubt, however, that a large body of men is in actual rebellion against the Imperial authorities, over whom they have obtained some important advantages. Recently they have taken the chief City of the Ho district, a place of great commercial importance, bordering the province of Kwang-tung on the North-west, the city being situated on a navigable branch of the Canton River. It is even stated on good authority that the rebels, 2,000 strong, have penetrated into Kwang-tung, and are within 100 miles of Canton City. The leader, who is named Li-ting-pang, has assumed the title borne by the highest Tartar Generals, and displays banners inscribed "Commissioned by Heaven to exterminate the Tsing (the present Manchu) and restore the Ming (the former Chinese) dynasty." He is said to have under his command 50,000 men in all, which is probably an exaggeration. He and his fellow chief, Tsau, are said to assume great state, and move about in chairs with four bearers. After a successful attack on Kong Mun in the district of Sz-hwui, the pawnshops were rifled, and 20,000 taels of silver extorted from a rich inhabitant; after which about a hundred cookshops were set up to provide for the band. It is further reported, besides some persons of importance having fallen in the flight, that the Governor of the province, and the Chief Magistrate of Woo-chau, have committed suicide in despair; but these reports also require confirmation. The province contains many independent tribes who have never owned subjection to the present dynasty."

A vast conspiracy has been discovered at Teheran, Persia. Its object was to dethrone the present Scah, and replace him by a descendant of Ali, and to drive all the Turks out of Persia. Numerous arrests had taken place at Teheran and in the principal towns. The greater part of those arrested belong to the corps of Ulemahs.

Twenty Days Later from California.

The steamers Empire City, Georgia, and Cherokee, from Chagres, arrived at New York last week, bringing some eleven hundred passengers, about two millions in gold dust, and news from California to Oct. 5, twenty days later.

Another great fire—the fourth within nine months—has visited San Francisco. It broke out on the morning of the 17th of September, in a restaurant, and was not subdued until it had destroyed four squares, which included about three hundred buildings. The loss is estimated at one million of dollars.

The mines are represented as yielding quite satisfactorily; but an unexpected rise in the waters of the American River had carried away several dams, and disappointed the expectations of a good many diggers.

By this arrival we have news of terrible suffering among the emigrants on the Plains. "Alto California," of Sept. 24, gives the substance of two letters from Capt. Waldo, one written at Great Meadow, Humboldt River, the other dated Truckee River, Sept. 15th.

He states that the Relief Committee have not a single pound of flour east of the Mountains, that he entered the Desert on the 7th inst., met two men who had given up to die from starvation; same day two men died from starvation on Carson Desert; that those with wagons have no food, but their poor exhausted animals; that footmen subsisted on the putrified flesh of the dead animals along the road, and disease and death are consequently sweeping them down. The Cholera made its appearance on the 8th, and eight persons out of a small train died of it in three hours. The Indians take every advantage to steal their animals, and thus many are left more than six hundred miles beyond the settlements. Fighting between them and the emigrants occurs almost daily. Twenty thousand persons are yet beyond the Desert, of which number fifteen thousand "are now destitute of all kinds of provisions, yet the period of their greatest suffering has not arrived. It will be impossible for ten thousand of this number to reach the mountains before the commencement of Winter." From the Truckee to the head of the Humboldt the cholera is killing them off; the sick surround the Truckee Station unable to proceed. Capt. W. was about starting to try to persuade such as are from four to six hundred miles back, to return to Salt Lake. He calls for 10,000 lbs. of flour for the Station at Truckee, and the same amount for the Summit. He says that those back several hundred miles will die by starvation unless relieved. He asks for contributions, and offers to the City Council his claim to $10,000 worth of property, if they will forward that amount in flour and articles for the sick to that place. His report is fearful. A black man from Boston rode express 400 miles with the information.

The Overland Emigration to California.

A gentleman who went to California by the overland route, writes to the Tribune, under date of Sacramento City, Sept. 10, as follows :—

An extreme amount of suffering attended the latter end of the route, for want of provisions, and as half are still behind, unless succor meets them there will be suffering indeed. Thousands are entirely destitute, and were obliged to make that distance with no other means of living but upon the roots, berries and small game they could pick up, and the charity of emigrants. Many, having no money to buy, and too proud to beg, lived for a month on raspberries, &c. In fact, those who had no money, and made known their situation, got along better than those possessing money, for the latter were always refused, hoping they would soon find those possessing provisions to exchange for money, while no such excuses could be urged against the importunities of the former. I know of no actual case of starvation, because there seemed to be united feeling and interest among all Californians, that would not permit another to suffer while there was meat to divide. On Carson River the needy met a Relief Station, established by citizens of California.

The Overland Emigration must indeed reap a golden harvest to repay it for its necessary sacrifices, its losses, and the hardships and privations experienced. Many believe there are dead animals enough on the Desert (45 miles) between Humbolt Lake and Carson River, to pave a road the whole distance. We will make a moderate estimate, and say there is a dead animal to every five feet left on the desert this season, which would make about 45,000 head. This number, at the low average of $50 for horses, mules and cattle, would produce over $2,000,000! I counted 153 wagons within one and a half miles. Not half those left were to be seen, being burnt to make lights in the night, &c. Before all is over, there will be as many as 100 wagons to the mile, which at $100 make $450,000. Then the Desert is strewn with all other kinds of property—tools, clothes, crockery, harness, &c., &c., and there cannot be left on this Desert this season less than $3,000,000 of property. No emigrant, upon reflection, will dispute this.

My short residence here will not justify me in making any remarks upon the country; but this I know, Sir, that California of 1849 is not California of 1850. A great change has taken place, and this year's emigration is most egregiously disappointed. Surface mining yields nothing near the amount it did last year. Labor rates from $2 to $5 per day, and hundreds are working for their board; but the latter are only the necessitous, possessing neither money, tools, nor provisions, to go to work with, and consequently compelled to accept any offer.

The brig Grand Turk has arrived at Savannah, Ga., from Providence, R. I., with an entire cargo of machinery for the Macon Cotton and Wool Manufacturing Company, in that State.

DISCOVERIES IN THE ANCIENT COPPER DIGGINGS.—We were shown last week, says the Lake Superior Journal, a copper arrow-head and a piece of human skull and other bones, which have lately been found in the Ancient Indian Diggings on the Ontonagon River. The native copper arrow-head is now about two inches in length, but seems to have had, originally, a socket, though but part of it remains. Several chisels, or instruments resembling chisels, having sockets like the common carpenter's chisel, and small gads or wedges, have also been found at the Minnesota Mine. But the greatest curiosity we have seen in the way of these articles, is the stick of oak timber lately taken out of one of the ancient "pits" or shafts at the Minnesota Mine, 27 feet below the surface. It is a small tree, about 10 feet in length, and eight or ten inches in diameter, having short limbs 2 feet apart, and at nearly right angles with one another; and on this account, and from its standing nearly upright, it is supposed to have been used as a ladder by the ancient miners. In this shaft and around and over this stick were rocks and earth, and large trees were growing over it; and many centuries must have elapsed since that ancient ladder was placed there.

WAR IN HAYTI.—Advices from Jeremie, Hayti, to the 15th of October, state that hostilities have actually commenced between the Haytiens and Dominicans. On the 9th ult., as the vanguard of Soulouque's army was descending the Pass of Bonica, they were attacked by about 500 Dominican troops, who drove back the Haytiens with terrible slaughter. The announcement of this defile skirmish caused much uneasiness to the Emperor, who marched on the 11th from Petit Goave, at the head of his staff and 400 of his Guards, to take the field in person against the Dominicans. In addition to the above defeat, a Haytien brig of war, with 250 men on board, was captured off Scott's Bay by two Dominican schooners of war, or gun boats, and carried as a trophy into Macao Roadstead. These hostilities have had a very disastrous effect upon the trade of the island. There was no coffee to be had, and the cutting of logwood was under restriction. [Tribune.

HOW THEY GET MARRIED IN ILLINOIS.—Mr. Henry Wheeler, of Greene County, and Minerva Steely, of McCrissin County, wanted to get married, but their friends did not want them to. They drove forty-five miles to Alton in order to escape this difficulty, but when they got there found that the law sternly required a license, which could only be had from the County Clerk, who resided in another town. Not discouraged, they engaged a parson, and jumped into a skiff, and were rowed over to a small bar in the river, directly opposite to Alton, where, shortly after sunrise, in the state of Mo., surrounded by water, isolated from the world, and the "rest of mankind," but in sight of the whole city, they solemnly plighted their troth. They returned in a few minutes to the shore, where they were welcomed with cheers by the assembled people.

A STRIKE AGAINST COLOR.—In New York, one day last week, Mr. Dennis Harris employed a colored man to wheel dirt from beneath the large building he is erecting in Duane street. This was the signal for about sixty or seventy Irishmen, engaged as laborers, to strike at once, and refuse to work unless the colored man was summarily dismissed. Mr. Harris decided that the poor man, the unwilling cause of this trouble, should be continued at any rate. The strikers afterward offered to make up a purse for the colored man, if he was dismissed. But, said Mr. Harris, ten thousand dollars cannot purchase his dismissal. Consequently, the building stood that day almost silent. Mr. Harris has formerly had to take the same stand in favor of Irishmen, with whom some Germans refused to work, and vice versa. [Tribune.

A dispatch dated New-Orleans, Friday, Nov. 1, says that the house of McDonogh, the millionaire, has been robbed by one of his slaves, assisted by five white men. The negro says they took three buckets of gold and silver. There was a package of notes amounting to $100,000 in the same room, which it seems was not taken. The idea of breaking McDonogh's will is now ridiculed by the New-Orleans papers.

The editor of the Frontier Guardian—the Mormon paper in Iowa—says he has a decided objection to the name of Utah, from a low and diminutive tribe of Indians, who inhabit Salt Lake valley and the surrounding valleys. He hopes that a petition will be sent to Congress to have the name changed, and that that body will give the citizens of Salt Lake the one they chose for themselves, "DESERET," the signification of virtue and industry.

The number of religious houses existing in the Sardinian dominions amounts to 483—that is, 384 in Piedmont, 253 for men and 131 for women; and 99 in the Island of Sardinia, 88 for men and 11 for women. The Journal, calculating the inmates of each at 20, finds 6,820 monks and 2,840 nuns, that is, one monk for every 670 inhabitants, and one nun for every 1,645.

The carrier pigeons let loose by Sir John Ross, one of the seekers for Sir John Franklin, have arrived at Ayr, Scotland, and made their way to their former dovecote. One bore the mutilated and illegible remains of a letter; it had apparently been shot at, having lost its legs. It is supposed that they had flown above 2,000 miles. Sir John took five pigeons with him.

She has been a worthy and devoted member of the Seventh-day Baptist Church in Berlin more than forty years. She was a sister of the above named Simeon Clarke, and both were originally of Westerly, R. I., descendents of the Clarkes who first settled in Newport, R. I. They came to their ends as shocks of corn fully ripe. The celebrated Dr. John Clarke (brother of Joseph Clarke, from whom the deceased were descended) was the founder and first pastor of the first Baptist Church in Newport, being the first Baptist Church in America. According to Callendar, the Church in Newport was organized in 1644; recent researches, however, prove it to have been organized in 1622. S. C.

Frasier sailed for California in the month of November of last year, and had been from home less than ten months at the time of his death. Although he has been cut off in the midst of his days, and has died in a land of strangers, yet it is a source of consolation to his afflicted relatives and friends, that in his last hours he was attended by his personal friends, some of whom were his covenant brethren. They speak of his death as peaceful and triumphant. His remains now repose on the east side of the American River, 300 feet above its surface. Bro. Frasier was a member of the Seventh-day Baptist Church of Pawcatuck.

Sister Babcock was a member of the first-day Baptist Church of Berlin, had many years been united by a living faith with her Lord, in whom her "life was hid," and was an observer of his much-despised Sabbath. Living, Christian piety was her ornament; dying, it was her stay, her comfort, and her highest solace. "Blessed are the dead who die in the Lord." J. S.

Proclamation,

By HAMILTON FISH, Governor of the State of N. Y.

The mercies of an all-kind Providence call for an acknowledgment of gratitude and of dependence from the creatures of his bounties.

The year which is about to close has been marked by innumerable blessings to us as a Nation. Abundant harvest and profitable labor have brought rich rewards to honest industry. Peace and tranquility are established at home; and no discord disturbs our relations abroad. Health, prosperity, and abundance, have been freely vouchsafed to us. Civil and religious liberty prevail throughout the length and breadth of the land. And to us all is secured the free exercise of the worship of their Creator according to their own faith. And on this occasion we should not forget, that while an inscrutable Providence has seen fit to remove during the past year the Chief Magistrate of our Union, that same Providence has preserved us under the trial a free and united People, has saved us from anarchy or civil commotion, and has continued to us the mild operation of a Government of our own adoption and rulers of our own choice.

I do, therefore, designate and recommend THURSDAY, THE TWELFTH DAY OF DECEMBER NEXT, to be observed by the good People of this State as a day of Public Thanksgiving to Almighty God.

In witness whereof I have hereunto subscribed my name and affixed the Privy Seal of the State, [L. S.] at the City of Albany, the 31st day of October, one thousand eight hundred and fifty.

By the Governor, HAMILTON FISH.

Miscellaneous.

The Swedish Songstress and Her Charities.

BY MRS. L. H. SIGOURNEY.

Blest must their vocation be
Who, with tones of melody,
Charm the discord and the strife,
And the railroad rush of life,
And with Orphean magic move
Souls inert to Life and Love.
But there's one who doth inherit
Angel gifts and angel spirit,
Bidding tides of gladness flow
Through the realms of Want and Woe,
'Mid lone Age and Misery's lot,
Kindling pleasure long forgot,
Seeking minds oppressed with night,
And on darkness shedding light;
She the seraph's speech doth know.
She hath done their deeds below,
So, when o'er this misty strand
She shall clasp their waiting hand,
They will hold her to their breast,
More a Sister than a guest. [Tribune.

Smoke Consumers.

It is gratifying to know, that human ingenuity has at last devised a protection for railroad travelers against the smoke and coal-cinders which render that mode of conveyance usually not only uncomfortable, but dangerous. Multitudes of persons have had their eyes seriously injured by the cinders which are drawn into the cars by the eddying currents of air produced by the rapid motion of the railway trains; and a general discomfort is often experienced, particularly in warm weather, from the necessity of closing the windows to avoid the annoyance. A patent smoke-consuming apparatus has been invented, and upon trial has proved to be effectual. It consists of what may be called an endless chain of bars; and this chain of bars forms the bottom of the furnace, on which the live coal blazes. The chain moves very slowly forward—not more than at the rate of an inch in the minute—from the front to the back of the furnace, carrying the fire along with it. At the back or bridge of the furnace, the chain of bars moves round and comes back again. Thus it goes on endlessly, from morning to night. The apparatus is fixed on a carriage, which is run into its place on a species of railroad; and the whole—that is, the whole bottom of the furnace can be dragged in or out at pleasure, by which means every facility is presented for cleaning, renovation, &c.

The chain of bars is moved by connecting gear from the steam engine. The coal is laid on a hopper at the mouth of the furnace, and is carried forward by the bars, the depth of coal that enters being regulated by an iron door, which is depressed or raised like a sluice. The principle of smoke-consumption consists in the slow and regular admission of the coal. Instead of being heaved in with a shovel, so as to produce continual gusts of smoke, it is admitted, as it were, by hair-breadths. The ignition is, therefore, little at a time; what smoke is raised, having to go over the whole bright fire beyond, is necessarily consumed. Nothing gets up the chimney that is perceptible to the eye. The apparatus, we are told, has the further advantage of economizing fuel and attendence, while it sustains the steam equally with the common practice of firing. The whole invention is as simple is it is ingenious. More than a year ago one of these patents was applied by the Messrs. Chambers, of Edinburgh, to a ten horse power engine, which they employed to drive their extensive printing machinery. They have found it every thing they desired. No smoke, they say, is ever seen to issue from their chimneys, and, on a calculation as right as could be made, the saving seems to be about one-twentieth of the fuel, or one tun to every twenty consumed without the patent. They have concluded that if a ten-horse power engine is any criterion, smoke is no longer an unavoidable nuisance in connection with locomotives and manufactories. [Eve. Post.

An Ingenious Jerseyman.

In a notice of a recent fair held at Newark, N. J., the Daily Advertiser refers to a very ingenious clock which was exhibited by Mr. A. D. Crane. It requires winding but once in three hundred and sixty-five days, and hence the ordinary chances of accidents by removing the shade to wind it, &c., are very much lessened, as compared with an ordinary eight-day clock. By simple inspection, it gives the time of the day, the days of the month during the whole year, the rising and setting of the sun and moon for any latitude, the phases of the moon, and the time of the sun and moon entering the signs, high and low tide, &c. This clock is also so improved as to compensate for differences of the motive power, and is calculated to be isochronal, the absence of which property in time-keepers has formerly been a very serious difficulty.

The inventor has always devoted himself to the study of Horology, and one of the editors of the Evening Post remembers having seen, many years since, at Caldwell, N. J., a wooden clock, made by him in his boyhood, with the assistance of no other tool but his penknife, which was unexceptionable ar an ordinary clock. The farmers of New Jersey are also indebted to his inventive genius for the best horse power now in use. The admirable clock in Trinity church, Newark, was constructed by Mr. Crane, and contains many novelties of value. The variation is but ten seconds in two months. The clock is divided into three parts; the time dial being in the gallery; the escapement is like that of a chronometer, with compensating pendulum, and the hands are carried by a separate weight, so that they may be moved irrespective of the clock, and are detached from it, though moved by it. This secures the works from receiving any injury from accidental movements of the hands by wind, ice, or other causes; but immediately on the removal of any disturbing cause, the hands resume their proper position, and are again acted upon by the clock. The striking is performed by one wheel and an escapement acting upon the hammer.

Mr. Crane's greatest achievement, however, has not yet met the public eye. He is now engaged in arranging the relative parts of a style of Chronometer for sea use, in a cheap form, with less than half the work of an ordinary movement. The train is calculated to run four days, but by a peculiar arrangement, it runs four days more, making eight days, and this without any extra expense in its construction. The escapement is peculiarly constructed, and gives four times as much motion to the balance as the best time-pieces. When manufactured, they may be afforded at one-sixth the usual price of ship-chronometers, and will perform equal to those of the highest cost.

The inventor has also made an improvement in the common Yankee clock, by which many parts are done away with, and their quality as time-keepers improved, while the price of a good brass clock will be lessened to one dollar.

Opening of the Erie Canal.

Twenty-five years ago this day, says the Albany Evening Journal of Oct. 26, the Erie Canal was announced as navigable from Lake Erie to Hudson River. On the 26th of October, 1825, eight years and four months from the time the work was commenced, the Erie Canal was completed, and on that day the "Seneca Chief," with De Witt Clinton, then Governor of this State, Lieut. Governor Tallmadge, and various Committees, on board, left Buffalo for the Hudson River. Along the entire line of the Canal, within hearing distance of each other, heavy artillery was placed, and the starting of the "Seneca Chief" from Buffalo was carried to the City of New York as fast as sound could travel, and by the same means it was announced in Buffalo that this great event was known in New York. This was before the present mode of communicating information by telegraph had been made known; but the plan was so well executed, that in one hour and thirty minutes from the firing of the first gun at Buffalo, the echo was heard in New York and returned to Buffalo. It was a day of great rejoicing throughout the State, and the arrival of the "Chief" at the various places along the line was signalized with great pomp and splendor. Every city and village had prepared its festival, and throughout the whole line, from the Lake to the Ocean, it was a voyage of triumph. On the second of November the "Seneca Chief" reached this city, eight days from Buffalo; and on the fourth she arrived in the City of New York.

When the fleet, which was composed of the "Seneca Chief" and several steam and other craft from Albany, New York and other places on the river, reached Sandy Hook, Gov. De Witt Clinton proceeded to perform the ceremony of commingling the waters of the Lake with the Ocean, by pouring a keg of Lake Erie water into the Atlantic, when he delivered the following address:—

"This solemnity, at this place, on the first arrival of vessels from Lake Erie, is intended to indicate and commemorate the navigable communication which has been accomplished between our Mediterranean Seas and the Atlantic Ocean in about eight years, and to the extent of more than four hundred and twenty-five miles, by the wisdom, public spirit, and energy of the people of the State of New York; and may the God of the heavens and the earth smile most propitiously on this work, and render it subservient to the best interests of the human race."

Pumping a Lake Dry.

Dr. J. V. C. Smith, the editor of the Medical and Surgical Journal, gives an interesting description, in his editorial correspondence from Holland, of the manner in which the Lake of Haarlem is being drained by steam engines, and its waters sent to the sea:—

"Six miles from Amsterdam is the inland lake of Haarlem, 21 miles long by 11 in width, which three hundred years ago was found to be perceptibly increasing by shooting its waters farther and farther, and covering up the land, threatening the first commercial port of the realm with destruction by flowing in upon its back. Various schemes, at that remote epoch, were devised by able counsellors to stay the threatened danger. Three Dutch engineers, of acknowledged ability, proposed draining off the water, first raising it by wind-mills. They are entitled to remembrance, from having suggested the very plan adopted in 1839 for averting an impending calamity. Seven years since, delay being no longer safe, a canal was dug around the whole circumference of the lake, averaging 200 feet in width by ten deep. Three monster steam engines are housed on the sides of the lake, some six or eight miles apart, each moving eight monstrous iron pumps. All the pistons are raised at once, at every revolution of the machinery, raising 15,000 gallons of water, which is emptied into the canal, whence it is hastened on by a fourth engine faster than it would otherwise move, to the Zuder Zee, and thus it reaches the sea 15 miles distant. In April, 1840, the pumps, worked by three of the largest steam engines perhaps ever constructed, were set in motion; and up to this date, July 25th, 1850, have lowered the contents of the lake seven feet. By next April, it is anticipated that the bottom will be fairly exposed, and all the water conveyed away from this ancient basin. All this is executed at the expense of Government.

Attachment of Birds.

While passing through the orchard a few days since, (says our informant,) I saw the most singular exhibition of attachment among the feathered songsters I ever witnessed. My attention was arrested by a mournful cry of a bird in apparent distress, and curiosity led me to the tree from which the singular cry proceeded. In one of the upper bows of the tree sat the sorrowful bird, apparently in distress. He would occasionally drop his wings as if pained, and then his bitter lamentation awakened a sympathy in my bosom, and a desire to avenge him of his adversary, if the cause of his grief could be ascertained. I succeeded in frightening him from the limb he first occupied—he immediately flew to another, and continued his imploring cry. I approached nearer, when, to my utter astonishment, I saw his mate lying dead in the forks of a limb by his side. He would flutter over the dead body of his mate, crying bitterly, and then alight on the nearest branch, exhibiting every expression of loneliness and grief. Curiosity led me a little further. I thought I would venture to take away the deceased bird, supposing that thereby the painful loss might be speedily forgotten. He saw me approaching the deceased, and instantly flew to the resting place of his loved one, seized her, and actually bore her out of my sight. I stood in utter astonishment at so singular an attachment among birds. A neighbor of mine, three days after, saw the same bird some distance from the place where I saw him, still uttering the same wailing cry by the side of the dead body of his mate.

Reproduction of Vegetable Forms.

In a number of the London Machanic's Magazine, is the following curious statement, said to be an extract from a work of Oetinger, entitled, "Thoughts on the two faculties of Feeling and Knowing:"—

"I chopped up some balm, put it into a large glass retort, poured rain water upon it, connected the retort with a good-sized receiver, and let it heat at a cuppel, gently at first, then more strongly. Upon this there went into the water a yellow-greenish oil; it took up the whole space of the receiver, and swam on the surface of the water the thickness of the back of a table knife. This oil had the form of innumerable balm leaves, which did not lap over or run into one another, but lay side by side, each perfectly drawn, and with the distinctness of all the lines of a balm leaf. I let it stand a long time, that all about me might observe it. At last I shook the receiver, because I had to pour it out; the leaves ran together, but in less than a minute restored themselves to their former position more distinctly."

A writer in the Magazine follows this quotation by saying:—

"Chemists show that the palingenese (being born again) or the resurrection of plants is very possible. Able chemists in great numbers have made experiments by which placing the ashes of a plant in a vial, these ashes exhale and arrange themselves as nearly as they can in the very figure which the Author of nature first impressed upon them.

"Gafierel, a very able chemist, states that M. Duchine, one of the best chemists, of the age, reported that he had seen a very able physician in Cracow, who kept in vials ashes of almost all plants, so that when any curious person desired to see, for example, a rose in a phial, he took one containing the ashes of a rose well preserved, and warming it over a lighted candle, after becoming warm the ashes were seen to be in motion. A little cloud arose, and after some motion of the vial, soon assumed the form of the rose, so fresh, and so perfect and beautiful, that one would believe he could smell its sweet odor."

"Once Caught, Twice Shy."

Many years ago, (says Mr. A. Smee,) I caught a common mouse in a trap, and, instead of consigning it to the usual watery grave, or the unmerciful claws of the cat, I determined to keep it prisoner. After a short time the little mouse made its escape in a room attached to my father's residence in the Bank of England. I did not desire the presence of a wild mouse in this room, and therefore adopted means to secure him; the room was paved with stone, enclosed with solid walls. There was no hope for him that he would ultimately escape, although there were abundant opportunities for hiding. I set the trap and baited it with a savory morsel, but day after day no mouse entered. The poor little thing gave unequivocal signs of extreme hunger, by gnawing the bladder from some of my chemical bottles. I gradually removed everything from the room that he could eat, but still the old proverb of "Once caught, twice shy," so far applied, that he would not enter the trap. After many days, visiting the apartment one morning, the trap was down, the mouse was caught; the pangs of hunger were more intolerable than the terrors of imprisonment. He did not, however, accept the unpleasant alternative of entering the trap until he was so nearly starved that his bones almost protruded through his skin; and he freely took bites of food from my fingers, through the wires of the cage.

Trees of the South.

Texas produces the pecan; Louisiana the cypress, which is the tree of the State; Mississippi the magnolia; Florida the live oak; Georgia and North Carolina the yellow pine; South Carolina the palmetto, though we fear the structure of this beautiful tree would be impracticable for useful purposes. This is the finest specimen of the palm family indigenous to the United States. This palm possesses a great, and, to this country, an increasing value. It is the only tree produced in our forests which is not attacked by the toredo navalis, or ship-worm; and as it is incorruptible in salt water, its value for sub-marine construction is almost incalculable. Its leaves can be employed in the manufacture of hats, baskets, mats, and many other purposes of domestic economy; "the cabbage," composed of the unexpanded embryo leaves, may be classed among the most delicious vegetables produced at our tables. It is, however, a wasteful luxury, as the tree always perishes when deprived of this part of its foliage. It grows along the sea-coast of Carolina and Georgia, confined to the neighborhood of salt water; preferring damp, rich soils. Flowers in June—July.

IDIOCY—OPIUM.—Dr. Enos Stevens, Examining Agent for the Massachusetts Commissioners for the prevention and cure of idiocy, has a manuscript work wherein occurs the following:—

"At Cambridge Poor House, there are three well-formed and strong brothers, whose names are Joseph Cox, 23 years old, George Cox, 20, and Wm. Cox, 18. These are all the children that their mother had. Their father was a very respectable mechanic, and has a very intelligent child by a second wife. The mother of these idiotic boys was a devotedly benevolent woman, who often took narcotic drugs, and went out whole days and nights to visit and assist the sick among her neighbors; leaving her own children all put asleep by laudanum, (which is wine and opium.) Every day when they cried, and every time she wished to go out, she put them all asleep with laudanum. At length their whole organization assimilated to such a state of body and mind, and they have grown up to the size of manhood, with the avenues of their brains practically closed by drugs; so that they have merely infantile powers of mind, and strength of bodies."

A VALUABLE HINT.—The Free Democrat (Wisconsin,) relates the following remark of Miss Bremer, during her sojourn in Milwaukie:—

"On entering a private dwelling, she was asked to sit near the fire, where some other ladies were seated, but replied, 'No, no; you American ladies are very handsome, but you are too white. You sit down by a fire of your own making, and neglect the great fire that God has placed in the heavens, which would give you health and a better color.'"

AUTHOR OF THE MORMON BIBLE.—The New England Puritan states that at a public meeting held lately in Cherry Valley, Judge Campbell said:—

Rev. Solomon Spaulding, one of the earliest preceptors of the academy at Cherry Valley, was the actual composer of most of what is known as the Mormon Bible. He wrote it during a period of delicate health, to beguile some of his weary hours, and also with a design to offer it for publication as a romance. Doctor Robert Campbell, late of Cherry Valley, and foster father of the first Mrs. Grant of the Nestorian Mission, calling some years since upon Mr. Spaulding, had the manuscript of this notable book shown to him, and was also informed by Mr. Spaulding that he had hopes of reaping some pecuniary advantage from it for himself and family. Mr. Spaulding has been dead some years, though it is believed his wife is still living in the United States. How it passed from the possession of his family into the hands of Joe Smith, it is probable that Mrs. Spaulding could tell.

PRINTER'S CHALLENGE.—A Cincinnati paper boasted of a compositor who set up, in seven working days, 90,750 ems. The Utica Herald has a compositor, Henry Keeling, who did the following week's work in six days:—

Monday, August	19	19,250 ems
Tuesday, "	20	17,500 "
Wednesday, "	21	17,800 "
Thursday, "	22	17,400 "
Friday, "	23	17,400 "
Saturday, "	24	12,000 "
Total		100,950

Thus beating the Cincinnati boy 19,200 ems in one day's less working time.

During this period Mr. Keeling distributed his own case, and corrected his own proof. He commenced work each morning at 7 o'clock, and left off at about 8 P. M., devoting about two hours and a third each day to his meals. On the last day (Saturday,) he did not work over eight hours. The average time of working did not exceed ten hours each day. The Cincinnati boy must try again.

FRENCH REWARDS FOR SCIENTIFIC MEN.—M. Antoine d'Abbadie and M. Armand d'Abbadie have, on the recommendation of the Minister of Agriculture and Commerce, been nominated by the President of the Republic members of the Legion of Honor, for "the services they have rendered to geographical science and to commerce by their journeys in Abyssinia." In a long report to the President, the minister recapitulates the efforts made by the enterprising travelers to trace the Nile to its source, and their observations on the different African tribes with whom they came in contact. They endured many hardships, and braved many dangers, but succeeded, among other things, in collecting a mass of curious information on the literature of the Ethiopians, whose language M. Antoine d'Abbadie spent some time in studying. The result of this gentleman's observations was, that "the principal source of the White river, or the real Nile, is in the Forest of Babia, on the southern frontier of Inari," and there, he says, he had the satisfaction of planting the tri-colored flag on the 19th of January, 1846.

RESTORING LIFE.—Mr. William Burdick, of Newport, R. I., while eating supper on Wednesday, Oct. 10th, choked himself with a piece of beef steak. He soon became speechless, struggled violently, and became first black and then pale in the face and perfectly lifeless. Medical aid soon removed the obstruction, but the pulse had ceased, and he was pronounced dead. Artificial means of restoring life were resorted to,—cold water was dashed upon his face,—artificial respiration was attempted, and he was bled freely. After the last had been done, consciousness was suddenly restored—he raised his head quickly, pointed to his throat, and said, "Gone!" After the overwhelming feeling of suffocation and impending death, Mr. Burdick had no recollection of any painful sensation, or of any of the circumstances which occurred, until after he was bled. His case should be a warning against too soon abandoning efforts to restore life in similar instances of sudden death. [Courier and Enquirer.

BALLOONING.—The Spanish papers are filled with accounts of the famous balloon constructed by M. Montemayor, of Madrid, which is said at last to have solved the grand problem of ærial navigation, independent of, and even against the winds. It is announced, with as much confidence as is the sailing of an English steamer, that the Eolus, Jose Montemayor, commander, will leave Madrid on the 15th inst., and crossing the Pyrenees, will pass over Bordeaux, and traverse France on its way to London, whither M. Montemayor goes to pocket the reward there offered to him who shall invent the means of guiding and controlling the course of a balloon in the air. The Eolus is a colossal affair, of a capacity of 530,000 gallons. Upon a sort of prow is fixed a large tube, which is made by means of internal machinery to inspire from the front a great quantity of air, which is forcibly ejected in the rear against the balloon. It is also provided with large wings, resembling in shape those of birds, which are made to work—accounts don't tell us how.

"THE HIGHER LAW."—The Syracuse Daily Journal publishes the following as an extract from a speech of Mr. John C. Spencer, in the Legislature of 1820:—

"I go further than the gentleman from Delaware (Erastus Root) on this subject. He says that the adoption of the Declaration of Independence in this State Constitution renders Slavery unconstitutional. I contend that the first act of our nation, being a solemn recognition of the liberty and equality of all men, and that the rights of life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness were inalienable, was the corner stone of the Confederacy, and is above all Contstiutions and all laws."

The schooner Eliza Ann, (of Cohasset,) cleared at Boston, on Monday, for Cumana, Venezuela, to recover the treasure from the wreck of the Spanish ship "San Pedro," sunk near Cumana. She took an engine, diving bell, and other machinery necessary for the experiment, and thirteen men.

MINNESOTA AND THE STOCKBRIDGE INDIANS.—The St. Paul (Minnesota) Chronicle of the 14th ult., says that John H. Quinby and Ziber H. Peters, Chief and Council-man of the Stockbridges, in Wisconsin, have returned from their exploring trip up the St. Peter's River. They were delighted with the country, and will make preparations to remove and settle in some part of the Minnesota territory. In exchange for their townships of improved land in this section, Government has agreed to give them two townships of unimproved lands, selected from any unoccupied United States lands; to remove them free of all expense, and to give an annuity of $2,000 for ten years. The Stockbridges number about 200, are educated, and have adopted the habits and costume of the whites.

Variety.

The indigo plant was a native of South Carolina. It grew spontaneously among its weeds and woods. More than one hundred years ago the planters there commenced its cultivation. In the year 1748, South Carolina exported to Great Britain 200,000 lbs., and the parliament granted a bounty of 12 cents per pound to induce its greater cultivation. In 1781, indigo was one of the staples of South Carolina, and we believe of Georgia. Now, in 1849, not a single pound of indigo is raised in South Carolina, or as far as we know in all the South.

Coffee was originally introduced from Arabia, where it has been used as a beverage from time immemorial. It was first known in England in the year 1653. Daniel Edwards, an English merchant of Smyrna, brought with him, in that year, from the East, a Greek by the name of Pasqua, whom he set up in trade in the first coffee house, in a shed near St. Michael's, Cornhill. The new article soon grew into universal favor.

Mr. Soyer gives a novel and certainly very convenient method of making coffee, which he assures us is preferable to any in use. "Put two ounces of ground coffee into a stew-pan, which set upon the fire, stirring the powder round with a spoon until quite hot, when, pour over a pint of boiling water; cover over closely for five minutes, when, pass it through a cloth, warm again, and serve."

A London paper contains this account of a new finger-saving invention:—"A snuff-box of a novel construction, and designed to supersede the necessity of using the fingers in taking snuff, has been registered at Birmingham. The box is inverted, and upon being turned up, two small cups are found charged with the titillating mixture, and ready to be applied to the nose."

The number of Journals and periodicals at present published in Russia is 154, of which 64 appear at St. Petersburgh, 13 at Moscow, 22 in the Baltic provinces, and the rest in different parts of the empire. Only 108 of them are in the Russian language; the others are in German, French, Polish, &c.

Parliamentary Statistics state, that while the annual expense for bread in Great Britain is about $30,000,000, the consumption of liquor is about $250,000,000. Over 30,000,000 worth of grain is annually converted into intoxicating drinks. The dram shops and taverns in England alone amount to 110,000.

A most interesting discovery is reported to have been made in Russia, between Dorpat and Norva, of a combustible as carboniferous and calefactory as coal. It is of a yellowish brown color, with white spots, and is the subject of much speculation, being said to be of a much earlier geological period than any known coal field.

ames Curtiss, Mayor of Chicago, has been deposed by the City Council, and A. S. Sherman elected in his stead. He refused to sign certain bonds prepared by order of Council, whereupon the Council declared the office of the Mayor vacant, and elected A. S. Sherman, one of the members, Mayor of the city.

The London Daily News says that "nearly one half of the population of England and Wales are unable to read and write. A large portion of the other half have received the scantiest instruction. Destitution, vice and crime abound because the people are untaught. The jails and workhouses are full."

The London correspondent of the New-York Herald states that the commercial tonnage of the United States is 20,000 tons more than that of England, the former being 3,150,000 tons, and the lattar 3,130,000 tons. If this be true, we are of course the first commercial nation in the world.

A schooner recently arrived at Boston from Nova Scotia, with three hundred barrels of potatoes, only fifteen of which proved good at the time of opening the hatches. When she started, twelve days before, they were in perfect order, and better potatoes, it is said, were never seen.

The State of Maine pays to the various clergymen employed in the State, about $20,000 per annum. There are also 6844 teachers in the various schools in the State, and about $300,000 are annually raised for common school purposes.

Of 22,000 families in this City, recently visited by the indefatigable agents of the New York Bible Society, over 6,000, or more than one-fourth part, were found destitute of the Bible.

A number of Baltimoreans are engaged preparing documents for the purpose of proceeding to Philadelphia, New York, Boston and other cities, in quest of Fugitive Slaves.

Wm. Duffy, convicted at Ipswich of burning the Danvers Congregational Church, has been sentenced to the State Prison for life.

From Natchez, (Miss.,) there are accounts that the frost has made bad work with the cotton crops and vegetation generally.

Taylor Davidson, who carries on the hardware and cutlary business in Cincinnati, imports his goods direct from Sheffield, England, to the yearly amount of $500,000.

The new Constitution of Michigan disfranchises duelists and their accessories, and disqualifies them from holding office.

The artistic value of the works of art contained in the churches of Antwerp, eleven in number, is estimated at nearly $10,000,000.

The year is divided into three terms:—

The first, of 14 weeks, begins Wednesday, August 21st, and ends Wednesday, November 27th.

The second, of 15 weeks, begins Monday, December 2d, and ends Friday, March 14th.

The third, of 14 weeks, begins Tuesday, March 18th, and ends Tuesday, June 24th.

Other competent Teachers will be employed as occasion may demand.

TEACHERS' CLASSES will be formed, as usual, at the beginning of the Fall and middle of the Winter Terms, and continue seven weeks.

In the Common Branches, classes will be formed at the commencement of each term; but in the higher, the interest of the student, as well as the welfare of the Institution, demand that a more systematic course of study be pursued.

In the Natural Sciences, Elementary Chemistry and Philosophy will be pursued during the Fall Term; Agricultural Chemistry, Astronomy, and Physiology during the Winter Term; Botany and Geology during the Summer Term.

Classes will be formed in Latin, French, and German, at the commencement of the Fall Term; in Hebrew, Greek, and Spanish, at the commencement of the Winter Term, and continue through the course of study.

In Mathematics, Geometry is studied in the Fall, Trigonometry and Conic Sections in the Winter, and Astronomy, Surveying, Navigation, &c., in the Summer Term.

The course of instruction in Agriculture is thorougly scientific, embracing study and recitation in the best authors. Instruction is given in a well-furnished laboratory, in the analysis of soils, ashes of plants, manures, &c. and the modes of testing for their constituent elements. The attention of farmers who wish to give their sons a practical education is especially called to this department.

Board in private families, from $1 25 to $1 50. Many students board in clubs for 60 to 75 cents.

FOREIGN MISSION.

The following communication from Bro. Carpenter to the Board, though of an older date than some which have been published, will nevertheless be read with interest.

Our last, per ship Candace, was dated January 15. Our meetings had been rather thinly attended for some time, as our letters show. It occured to me, that we had a lantern and slides for illustrating Astronomy, and that true science is the hand-maid of religion. And it seemed, that such aid was particularly needed, for the double purpose of enlarging our congregations and teaching the great truth of a self-existent and almighty Creator. Accordingly, I have taken the lantern into the Chapel three or four times since the date of our last; and, as you will see, it has had the effect to increase the number of attendants considerably. The people do not know when to expect it, consequently all our meetings are better attended. The common people are very ignorant of astronomical facts, most of them believing that the sun, moon, and stars, actually revolve around the earth every day. There is one slide which I need very much. It is rather expensive—would cost perhaps four or five dollars. It is a slide which represents by wheel-work the motions of all the planets around the sun at one view. Also, it would be very interesting, and might serve to keep up an interest for a good while, if we had slides illustrating natural history, botany, &c. We should calculate to use these just enough to keep our congregations full, while our main attention would of course be given to the preaching of the word. And while we are limited to our present chapel, these helps are quite needful. We think it might be well, at all events, to have such helps on hand, ready to be called into service whenever circumstances might demand. Perhaps, if we have chapels in good locations, such helps might never be required. But before we can possibly erect other chapels and other houses, in other words, while we live in this house, these helps will be of great value.

I see in one of the Recorders which have recently come to hand, that I formerly made an estimate of the cost of a site, dwelling-house, and chapel, in a good location, in which the whole expense would be about $5,000. Since that was written, I have written to you concerning another site which can be bought for $400. Dr. Bridgman had his eye on it, and rather wanted it, but providentially, as I consider it, he has purchased another site. Recently Bro. Wardner has had his attention directed to another site, which is for sale, and can be bought for $600, or less—perhaps for $500. This is on the same street with the other concerning which I have written, and a little less than half a mile from it. Our opinion now is, that more good can be done by building two small chapels than by building one large one. Let each missionary have his chapel, and feel that he is responsible to God for keeping up an interest there. Are there not weighty reasons why each church at home needs a settled pastor? And may not the same reasons operate, to a considerable extent, even in a heathen land? These reasons are so numerous and so obvious that I will not at present dwell on them. The best plan, as it seems to both of us at present, is, first to secure each of us a lot; then, as soon as practicable, erect each of us a chapel that will not cost over $1000 each. Perhaps, after that, it might be thought expedient to erect each of us a small dwelling-house on our respective lots; and perhaps we would do better to live where we do. This question could be decided better by-and-by. I will add here, that the missionaries of the London Society are aiming to carry out the plan of giving to each missionary his chapel. They expect soon to build one that will cost about $1,200. I mention this to show that we are not alone in our opinion.

I will now give a few extracts from my journal, premising that most of the incidents here related are such as occur out of study hours, while we are taking our accustomed exercise, while our main attention is given at present to the study of the classics.

Jan. 21st—More than a usual number at chapel. 27th, Sabbath eve—More than a usual number at chapel. 28th, evening after the Sabbath—More yet; about sixty persons.

30th—Received news of the decease of a sister, which occurred June 29th, at the Columbia School, Arkansas:—

"Why do we mourn departing friends,
Or shake at death's alarms?
'Tis but the voice that Jesus sends
To call us to his arms.

Then let the last loud trumpet sound,
And bid our kindred rise:
Awake, ye nations under ground;
Ye saints, ascend the skies."

31st.—In my walk on the city wall I fell in company with a Chinaman, who proved to be a cotton merchant. As he appeared to enjoy conversation, we came home together, and conversed a good while upon the doctrines of the Bible. He appeared somewhat interested, and when he left he asked for a book, and promised to attend chapel.

Feb. 1st. The cotton merchant came again, bringing his book. We conversed some, and read together the 1st and 2d chapters of Luke's gospel, accompanied with explanations, of course, after which I proposed to him to kneel down with me while we offered prayer to the true God. He assented. After prayer he departed, promising to return again.

2d—Sab. eve. Our meeting quite small, but the cotton merchant was present. Evening after the Sabbath, meeting quite small.

3d. Conversed with a Chinaman on the wall close by a temple of Shangte. The topic was the character of the true God as distinguished from idols. Also conversed with the family of our former teacher.

4th. By taking a little pains, I obtained a good opportunity to communicate gospel truth to a man on the wall. He was from the country, and seemed considerably interested.

5th. Sat with the Revising Committee while they revised the ten commandments. Also conversed with the cotton merchant; read with him the 3d chapter of Luke, and prayed with him.

6th. Tried to reason with some sellers of incense and candles for idol worship, near an idol temple.

7th. Went into an idol temple where was a large image of Shangte, and tried to reason with the poor deluded heathen. They treated me with marked respect.

8th. Find the mind of my teacher is still dark and confused. The greatest difficulty is, that he is a thorough worldling, and does not care to know more than he does. Although he daily bows the knee to the true God, his heart still goes after its covetousness.

9th—Sab. eve. Only three besides our own households at chapel. Evening after Sabbath, not one at chapel besides our own households. The closing up of the Chinese year is a very busy time for all classes. All debts must be settled, and preparations must be made for ushering in the new year. These are probably the reasons why, for the last two Sabbaths, our assemblies have been so small.

12th. Chinese new year; celebrated with less eclat than usual, in consequence of the death of the Emperor's mother.

21st. A visit from the uncle, sister, and two cousins of our former teacher. The uncle is a man of about sixty, possessed of good abilities. I endeavored to communicate to him faithfully the great truths of the Bible. But he is in a deep sleep. Whether he can ever be awakened out of it, remains to be seen. When you send more missionaries, send those that can thunder the messages of divine truth in the ears of these stupid idolaters in such a manner that they may not fail to hear the voice of the Son of God, and so hear that they may live. For one, I feel quite incompetent to this work.

23d—Sab. eve. About thirty at chapel. Evening after Sabbath, about a hundred at chapel. Particular notice had been given that something would be said upon the subject of astronomy.

25th. Went into a tea shop and had an interesting conversation with several individuals.

26th. Spent a part of the day with a missionary. His wife, who had read Mr. Morton's Circular, expressed her convictions in favor of the Sabbath, and also in favor of immersion.

27th. Three Chinese ladies called on us. They listened with as much attention as could be expected to a few plain remarks on the Bible and its Author, repentance and faith.

28th. Visited a celebrated spring, about four miles from this. The water, in consequence of the ejection of carburetted hydrogen gas, is in a constant state of ebullition. Chinamen gathered around. We went into a large rich temple of Buddha, which stands near the spring. Here we saw a very large image of Buddha, and many other gilded images; one of them had forty-four arms, and as many hands, indicative of great power. We could but feel that we were standing on the enemy's ground, and that we were called upon to leave our testimony in favor of the true God. There were perhaps a hundred persons who followed us into the temple, and many of them priests of Buddha. We made some inquiries concerning their system of religion, and then asked if they wished to know what we believed; receiving an affirmative answer, and all appearing to be in a friendly mood, we spoke the word to them, particularly inveighing against idolatry.

March 3d. Evening after Sabbath, about sixty persons at chapel. Morning, attended the dedication of the First-day Baptist Church. Although rainy, there were perhaps five hundred persons present.

4th. I have got the list of 4000 characters mounted on a single sheet to hang up before my study table; the sound, tone, and definitions, are all written out. I find that the best way to learn them is to learn each character as I come across it in reading. I can learn more thoroughly and with less effort in this way.

5th. As an illustration of the filial system in China, upon the occasion of the decease of the Emperor's mother, an edict is sent all over the Empire forbidding, for an hundred days, all classes to wear red, yellow or blue clothing, to shave the head, to marry or give in marriage, or to make music; and for a whole year they are not allowed to act plays of which they are so fond. This edict went into operation on the 2d day of the present month.

9th—Sab. eve. About thirty at chapel. Evening after Sabbath, about sixty at chapel. Morning, heard a man near our door crying out for some time with a shrill voice; at length, learning that he was a beggar proposing to sell his wife to obtain rice, I went out, not to purchase, but to give him a few cash, together with some advice. When I reached the street, he was nearly out of sight, going to another place. I followed, and soon found him, with his wife by his side, kneeling by the side of the street. He was crying out with a lamentable voice, to attract persons to come and buy. His wife had a wheat straw stuck in her hair, by which she was recognized as the person to be sold. I approached and asked him if that was his wife; he replied in the affirmative, and made signals for her to bow to me. She did so. Do you wish to sell your wife? Yes. Why? To obtain rice; I am already dead with hunger. This is bad doctrine, and a shameful thing. What! sell your own wife! Better die first. Here, take that and buy you something to eat. By this time there were perhaps thirty persons present. Some may only make a pretence, but I am told that some do actually sell their wives for bread. There is a good deal of distress among the poorer classes, in consequence of the high price of provisions. The foreign community have done something to relieve them. The news has spread into the surrounding country, and large numbers are flocking to the city to obtain rice, so that it is difficult for a foreigner to walk out without encountering droves of these squalid creatures. At one place in the suburbs two wealthy Chinamen have made provision for poor children, to feed and lodge them until the crops of the present season begin to come in. We visited that place a few days since. Already two thousand were collected, and they were increasing every day.

11th. The mother of our former teacher came to me for help. She said she had herself and her aged mother, who was blind, to support, and was destitute of means. I gave her a little, together with a talk upon the doctrine of the cross. She thanked me very politely for the cash, and listened very patiently to the talk.

16th—Sab. eve. Preached to about fifty, most of them grown persons, upon the compassion of Christ for sinners. If I mistake not, there was a solemn feeling in the assembly. Sabbath morning, walked out and conversed with several on the all-important subject of salvation by Jesus Christ. Talked a long time with a friend of Le Chong (formerly called in our letters Too Quay.) His name is She Mo Sung. He has been here several days, has been here before, and appears like a simple minded, honest man. He professes to like the doctrine.

Evening after Sabbath, eighty or ninety at chapel. If astronomy could always possess the charms to them that it appears to now, we should hardly need another chapel. But it is mainly the novelty of the exhibitions made with the lantern, and not a real love of knowledge, probably, that calls them out. This cannot always last. The novelty will soon be over.

Morning, visited the family of our former teacher. Had some conversation with Ne May upon the subject of baptism, in the presence of her mother. This will be a great cross for her to bear. Her mother, unless she becomes changed in her purpose, will undoubtedly oppose it. I did not directly urge it, but told her that if she should become decided in her purpose to follow the Saviour, baptism would be a duty not to be dispensed with. I wished her to have the idea of discipleship and of obedience to this command so connected in her mind that they could not be separated. She did not commit herself either on the affirmative or on the negative. Brethren, your prayers are requested on her behalf, and also on behalf of the other members of this family.

18th. In my walk, I came across a group of four, one of whom was a young woman who was lamenting bitterly. I paused, and inquiring the cause, was informed that she belonged to Soo Chou, a city about three hundred le from this. She had come to Shanghai; but poverty, as an armed man, had overtaken her; and the few wilted greens in her basket were a true index of her mind, fainting under the severity of her lot. I endeavored to point her to the Lamb of God, who was able to dry up her tears, and bestow upon her the consolation she so much needed, and in the name of a disciple gave her cash enough to purchase a bowl of rice. This is valued at less than half a penny. She thanked me, and I went on my way.

We hold meetings in the Chinese language regularly on the Sabbath, for the benefit of our teachers and other members of our households. Sometimes a few others drop in. The time is spent in reading and expounding the Scriptures, and in prayer, in which Bro. Wardner's teacher and Le Chong take an active part.

Our only hope is in God. He sometimes moves in ways mysterious to his creatures, and astonishes his saints with the overtures of his grace. Though he tarry, yet will we wait for him, while we endeavor to wait upon him. We know it is his will that we should spread the honors of his name among these poor deluded idol worshipers. We know it from his word, and we know it from the enjoyment we find in the work. We know that his bowels yearn over these poor deluded ones, and we can but hope that he will send his quickening Spirit to create anew in Christ Jesus, by the word, multitudes of those who are dead in trespasses and in sins, and that we shall ere long see them stand forth as the Lord's freemen, proclaiming liberty to other captives, and the opening of the prison doors to others that are bound. Pray for us, that our faith fail not, and that it may be increased a thousand fold; for just in proportion to our faith will be our usefulness. May the great Head of the Church preside in the deliberations of the Board. Yours truly,

S. CARPENTER.

SONGS AND HYMNS OF LIFE—No. 1.

BY CHARLES MACAY.

A traveler through a dusty road
Strewed acorns on the lea,
And one took root, and sprouted up,
And grew into a tree.
Love sought its shade at evening time,
To breathe its early vows,
And Age was pleased, in heats of noon,
To bask beneath its boughs;
The dormouse loved its dangling twigs,
The birds sweet music bore;
It stood a glory in its place,
A blessing evermore!

A little spring had lost its way
Amid the grass and fern,
A passing stranger scoop'd a well,
Where weary men might turn;
He wall'd it in, and hung with care
A ladle at the brink—
He thought not of the deed he did,
But judged that toil might drink.
He passed again—and lo! the well,
By summers never dried,
Had cooled ten thousand parching tongues,
And saved a life beside!

A dreamer drop'd a random thought;
'T was old, and yet was new—
A simple fancy of the brain,
But strong in being true;
It shone upon a genial mind,
And lo! its light became
A lamp of life, a beacon ray,
A monitory flame.
The thought was small—its issue great;
A watch fire on the hill,
It sheds its radiance far adown,
And cheers the valley still!

A nameless man, amid a crowd
That throng'd the daily mart,
Let fall a word of Hope and Love,
Unstudied, from the heart;
A whisper on the tumult thrown—
A transitory breath—
It raised a brother from the dust,
It saved a soul from death.
O germ! O fount! O word of love!
O thought at random cast!
Ye were but little at the first,
But mighty at the last! [Illustrated News.

RELIGIOUS MOVEMENT IN SWEDEN.

The religion of Sweden is Lutheran, and all the people belong to the Lutheran Church. But this Church lacks spirituality, lives on forms, and is essentially corrupt. Yet there have been some to preserve vitality, and a revival of considerable extent and power has been experienced there during the last year. Partly as the result of this, a movement has been made for resuscitating the Church, and diffusing religious life and truth throughout the country. A Home Missionary Society has been organized, and united with it are many of the best and most influential men in the land. Opposition of course has followed. All the newspapers have taken sides, and are engaged in discussing religious subjects. The reformers are called Pietists, and are assailed with great virulence. King Oscar has become alarmed, and put his veto on the new movement, so that the zealous friends of a spiritual and pure religion will have to operate in a less public manner for a time.

A letter from Sweden, appears in the Christian Advocate and Journal of last week, giving substantially the above facts, and adding:—

"Strange as it may appear, it is nevertheless true, that Jenny Lind has contributed not a little to increase the present religious excitment. We knew that this celebrated singer had not been received in the capital of her country with the enthusiasm which might have been expected. The reasons are before me, though I am not at liberty to make them all public. This much is, however, known, that the amiable songstress not only positively refused to appear on the stage as an actress, but on many occasions openly declared that the ungodliness of her fatherland filled her with alarm, and in her regular attendance upon public worship, selected those churches the pastors of which were known to be spiritually-minded. The fire now broke loose; all the papers, with the exception of two, whose opposition was more courteous, boiled over with the bitterest invectives against the Pietists, who had not only started the Home Mission, but, worst of all, taken captive the 'Swedish Nightingale.'"

The above is interesting, not only as a piece of religious history, but as giving a clue to Jenny Lind's religious character and influence at home. There, it seems, she has not hesitated to take firm ground against the theater, to make known in a public manner her sympathy with the most spiritual of the clergy, and to take part in their efforts to oppose ungodliness and reform the Church. And all this she has done in the face of enraged newspapers, and at a sacrifice of her popularity and influence. Thousands who have become interested in Jenny Lind will be glad of this incidental testimony respecting her religious principles, and the firmness with which she maintains them; and they will see a reason not before seen, for her anxiety to appropriate funds for the benefit of her native country.

"A pious lawyer in Upsala, about thirty miles north of Stockholm, has for some time held religious meetings in his dwelling; but last month a riotous attack was made upon his house. The matter was duly complained of in the proper quarter, but instead of justice being done to the aggrieved party, Henschen, the lawyer, was summoned before the consistory to receive a 'solemn reprimand.' Shortly afterwards a visit was made to Upsala by Dr. Gutzlaff, who delivered a discourse in the auditorium ecclesiasticum of the University, on the subject of the Chinese mission—a subject which had deeply interested the venerable Archbishop. As soon as Dr. Gutzlaff had concluded, a loose female advanced from a remote part of the hall, and poured forth a torrent of blasphemy and abuse of all Pietists, and in particular Henschen and Gutzlaff. Not only was no attempt made by the authorities to remove the wretched woman, but there is reason to fear she was merely the hireling of others. While subsequently visiting several remarkable spots in this ancient seat of learning, the party were insulted and pelted with stones; and later in the evening, the Doctor and a few friends were attacked in the lodgings of the former; but at length the watch interfered and removed the rioters. Gutzlaff declared, in the presence of many in Stockholm, that 'during many years, he had never, whether in Christian or heathen lands, witnessed such enmity against the truth as in Upsala.'" PETITIONS FOR PEACE.

AT THE REQUEST OF THE AMERICAN PEACE SOCIETY.

The friends of peace have from the first proposed to supersede the custom of war by peaceful substitutes that should be more effectual than the sword for all purposes of international justice and security. Rulers must be the agents in accomplishing this object; and, before the assembling of Congress in December last, we requested the friends of our cause throughout the country to unite with us in petitioning Congress in behalf of such substitutes; and with so much favor did the House of Representatives, in response to numerous petitions from nearly all parts of the land, entertain a proposition for referring the subject to a select committee, that the motion failed only by a single vote; and but for the very unusual degree of excitement on the slavery question at the time, would doubtless have been readily granted. This obstacle is now so far removed, that we may well hope, at the approaching session, for a more favorable hearing; and in this hope we would earnestly renew our request, that the friends of peace in all parts of the country will again unite with us in forwarding the largest number possible of petitions like the form which we give below, to be copied with such modifications as the petitioners may think desirable.

There ought to be two petitions—one to the Senate, and another to the House of Representatives; each of which should be signed by every petitioner, and should be addressed, one to a Senator from your own State, and the other to a Representative of your own district, or to some member of each House, known to be particularly interested in the matter, with a note requesting his early and special attention to the subject.

We solicit the prompt and zealous coöperation of our friends in this movement. We must depend entirely on their spontaneous response to this appeal for securing the requisite number of petitions. There is no time to be lost. Congress reässembles early in December; and the tables of both Houses ought, the very first week of the session, to be loaded with peace petitions, from all parts of the land. The work is already commenced under the best auspices in Vermont, where some of her first men, such as her late and her present Governor, and the Presidents of both her Colleges, have commended the movement to public favor. Let this praiseworthy example be followed throughout the country; and there would be poured upon Congress such an expression of the people's wishes on this subject as could hardly fail to secure favorable and efficient action.

We trust we shall not be thought to ask too much in soliciting editors, especially those of the religious press, to lay our requests before their readers, and ministers of the Gospel to commend it to their respective congregations, and enlist properly qualified persons to circulate petitions for signature, and then forward them to Washington.

On behalf of the American Peace Society, and by order of its Exec. Com.

GEO. C. BECKWITH, Cor. Sec.

Boston, Oct. 1850.

PETITION FOR PEACE.

To the Senate (or House of Reps.) of the U.S.

The undersigned, legal voters (or citizens or inhabitants) of——, in the State of——, deploring the manifold evils of war, and believing it possible to supersede its alledged necessity, as an Arbiter of Justice among Nations, by the timely adoption of wise and feasible substitutes, respectfully request your honorable body to take such action as you may deem best in favor of Stipulated Arbitration, or a Congress of Nations, for the accomplishment of this most desirable end.

RELIGIOUS GAMBLING.

Not long ago, in time of revival, a good man, the father of an interesting family, requested me to converse with his son, who had unfortunately become addicted to the vice of gambling. The young man was tenderly loved, and to his parents an object of anxious solicitude.

I called upon the son, and was received in a kind and amiable spirit. Frankly my object was stated and enforced by all the arguments familiar to my own mind. I urged the debasing influence of the vice; its tendency to lead to all forms of dishonesty; the wrong which was done to the loser, and the manifest injustice of thus receiving money which might be needed by the family of another.

The young man heard me through in respectful silence, seeming to admit the justice of all that had been presented. I supposed I had secured my object, and was about to leave with the prayer that God would bless my advice to his reformation and conversion, when he requested me to be seated a moment, while he made a brief statement.

"Three years ago," said he, "the H—— church held a fair and festivals. Those splendidly bound books you see on the table, were set up at lottery. After much persuasion on the part of a young female friend, a member of your church, I consented against my inclination, to purchase two tickets. The prize fell to me, and I was so elated with my good success, that I embraced the first opportunity to gamble on a larger scale, and since then have lost hundreds of dollars. But for that lottery under the patronage of a Christian church, I never should have become a gambler."

SCENE IN A HEBREW FAMILY.

The following interesting extract from the work of a recent traveler in the Holy Land, may serve to show the literal manner in which the Jews still observe some of the precepts of their Law:—

"The family of a Rabbi assembled in solemn conclave in the principal room of the house. In front of the divan, at the upper end of the apartment, a square table was placed, covered with a strange-looking tablecloth, on which was embroidered in colors on a white ground, with Hebrew letters, a prospect of the temple of Solomon, and some trees and figures. A silver lamp of a peculiar form was hanging from the ceiling, and all, the Hebrews, servants and maids, were seated on the divans, clothed in sumptuous raiment, excepting the lower servants, who were standing near the door at the lower end of the room. When all was ready, a little boy was brought in, and placed in the middle of the room by his nurse; and, after sundry injunctions from one of the Jewesses, the child lifted up his voice, and said to his grandfather, who occupied the seat of honor, 'What mean the testimonies, and the judgment, which the Lord our God hath commanded you?'

"Then the old man answered before them all, 'We were Pharaoh's bondmen in Egypt; and the Lord brought us out of Egypt with a mighty hand. And the Lord showed signs and wonders, great and sore, upon Egypt, upon Pharaoh, and upon all his household, before our eyes. And He brought us out from thence, that he might bring us in, to give us the land, which he sware unto our fathers,' etc., following literally the text of the 20th and following verses of Deuteronomy, 6th and 7th chapters.

"It was interesting to witness such a ceremony as this, still practiced by the descendants of the chosen race, whose victorious armies trampled on the necks of the ancient possessors of the land of Israel, and to hear these few trembling people, huddled together in the innermost recesses of a half-ruined house, recounting the mighty deeds of their ancestors, whose legions were irresistible, for they were led by the God of battles."

"I AM NEVER ALONE."

An old man sat in his easy chair. He was alone. His eyes were so dim that he could not read the printed page—he had long ceased to hear any common sound, and it was only in broken whispers that he could hold communion with those around; and often hours passed by in which the silence of his thought was not broken by an outward voice. He had outlived his generation; one by one the companions of his boyhood and youth had been laid in the grave, until none remained of all those he had once known and loved. To those to whom the future is one bright path of hope, and happiness, and social love, how unenviable seemed his condition—how cheerless his days!

I have said he was alone. A gentle and thoughtful child stole into his silent room, and twined her arm lovingly around his neck. "I feared you would be lonely, dear grandfather," said she, "and so I came to sit a while with you. Are you not very lonely here, with no one to speak to, or to love?" The old man paused for a moment, and laying his hand upon the head of the gentle child," he said, "How can I be lonely? for God is with me; the Comforter comes from the Father to dwell in my soul, and my Saviour is ever near to cheer and instruct me. I sit at His feet, and learn of Him; and though pain and sickness often come to warn me that this earthly house of my tabernacle is soon to be dissolved, I know that there is prepared for me a mansion, the glories of which no tongue can tell, no heart conceive. The love of God is like living water to my soul. Seek in your youth this fountain, my child. Drink deep of its living waters; and then, when your hair shall be whitened for the grave, when all sources of earthly enjoyment are taken away, you too can say, I am never alone."

Let this testimony of an aged and devoted servant of Christ sink deep into the heart of every child who reads these lines. Seek while in youth the source of that consolation which can be your joy in sickness, in trial, and in solitude—your stay when all earthly helps have failed. Then will it be your blessed privilege to say, "I, too, am never alone." [Christian Citizen.

THE LOSS OF THE FIRST-BORN.

We have read of a young mother who had newly buried her first-born. Her pastor went to visit her, and on finding her sweetly resigned, he asked her how she had attained such resignation. She replied, "I used to think of my boy continually—whether sleeping or waking; to me he seemed more beautiful than other children. I was disappointed if visitors omitted to praise his eyes, or his curls, or the robes that I wrought for him with my needle. At first I believed it the natural current of a mother's love. Then I feared it was pride, and sought to humble myself before Him who resisteth the proud. One night, in my dreams, I thought an angel stood beside me and said, Where is the little bud thou nursest in thy bosom? I am sent to take it away. Where is the little harp? Give it to me! It is like those who sound the praise of God in heaven.' I awoke in tears; my beautiful boy drooped like a bud which the worm pierces; the last wailing was like the sad music from shattered harp-strings; all my world seemed gone. Still, in my agony I listened, for there was a voice in my soul, like the voice of the angel who had warned me, saying, 'God loveth a cheerful giver.' I laid my mouth in the dust and said, Let thy will be mine; and as I rose, though the tear lay on my cheek, there was a smile also. Since then this voice has been heard amid duties of every day—methinks it says continually, 'The cheerful giver.'"

THE LAW OF GOD—WHAT IS IT?

A good deal is said about the Law of God; who knows what it is? In our childhood we were taught the Ten Commandments, and we always supposed that they constituted a brief summary of that law, the transgression of which makes a man a sinner, and exposes him to eternal fire. In other words, we considered that, notwithstanding the Old Testament enjoined a great many things of a ceremonial nature, which collectively were called the ceremonial law, and a great many other things having reference to the political and social condition of the Jews, which were denominated the judicial law, the Decalogue was, par excellence, the moral law. In our honest simplicity, we supposed, that there was a solid foundation for these distinctions; and when we began to exercise the ministry, we preached accordingly. But, since that, we have heard these distinctions boldly repudiated. We have heard it said, that they were unscriptural distinctions, and that the doctrine of the New Testament concerning the cessation of the law, applied to the whole of that which was enjoined upon the Jews under the ministry of Moses.

We never pretended, that the terms ceremonial, judicial, and moral, as applied to the law of God, were found in the Bible. It is sufficient for our purpose, if they convey scriptural ideas. But we cannot help asking, If everything enjoined in the Old Testament as law has ceased, what does that New Testament text mean which denounces transgression of the law as sin? John 3: 4. And what does Paul, a New Testament writer, mean, when he teaches that the whole world becomes guilty before God by transgressing the law? Rom. 3: 19. It is rather strange doctrine, that the law should have ceased, and yet the world stand covered with guilt before God for the transgression of it; for where there is no law, there is no transgression. Rom. 4: 15. Such questions show the absurdity of the doctrine, and prove that, notwithstanding the introduction of the gospel, there is yet law of some kind or other in force.

Why, then, should there be any hesitation in admitting that the Decalogue is this law? Let the truth be spoken. The real reason why so many hesitate, is that the admission of it would involve them in willful transgression. They have too much discernment not to see, that the fourth commandment requires the sanctification of the seventh day of the week, rather than the first. They see, that there is no obedience to this commandment in keeping the first day. The idea of changing their practice is not to be entertained for a moment; and so, to justify themselves, they take the ground that the Decalogue, as a code, does not constitute the moral law. It certainly behooves them, then, to tell what does constitute it; for, as we have seen, law of some kind continues in force under the gospel.

Some tell us, that the moral law is that law which is ascertainable by the light of nature, and for proof they refer to the Gentiles as doing by nature the things which it enjoins. Rom. 2: 14, 15. But it ought not to be overlooked, that the Apostle speaks of the Gentiles as doing the very things which that law revealed to the Jews enjoins; that is, as doing by nature the very duties enjoined in the Decalogue. For no one can suppose him to teach, that the Gentiles were justified in doing whatever their natural conscience suggested, however contrary to the revealed law of God. But in the next place it should be observed, that the Apostle does not teach, that the Gentiles did by nature all of the duties of the law, but that, as far as their obedience went, they were justified in it. Therefore, notwithstanding all that the Gentiles did by the light nature, they may have come far short of conformity to the whole law. Consequently their practice is not sufficient to determine the question, What is the moral law?

Others tell us, that so many precepts of the Old Testament as we find incorporated and distinctly recognized in the New, is the moral law. But if we are tied up to this rule for determining the question, by what rule did they determine it who lived before the New Testament was made? How did the Jews know what portion of the precepts enjoined upon them constituted the moral law? It was as necessary for them to know that they were sinners, as it is for us. It was necessary that they should be convinced of sin by the law, that they might, feeling their need, look forward by faith to the Redeemer who was promised. What law was it, which thus convinced them?

The writer of the epistle to the Hebrews informs us, that notwithstanding the rigid compliance of the Israelites with that portion of the law which was "a shadow of good things to come," they still had "conscience of sins." Heb. 10: 1—3. What was it that gave them this "conscience of sins?" If it be supposed that they felt themselves guilty, because they were not as exact in conformity to the ritual as they were required to be, this cannot be supposed of Paul himself. For he tells us, that "touching the righteousness which was in the law he was blameless." Phil. 3: 6. Nevertheless, when the law touched his heart, he was made to feel himself a sinner. (See Rom. 7: 7, &c.) The Jews, then, evidently had knowledge of some law besides that which was "a shadow of things to come." What law was it? How did they distinguish it?

The "shadow of things to come" was designed as a means of instruction to the Jews concerning salvation by a Redeemer. But if they received instruction concerning the way of salvation, they must first have been instructed concerning that from which they were saved. There was a law, therefore, independent of the "shadow," which gave them the knowledge of sin. Was not that law distinctly marked? Was there not drawn around it a clear line of demarkation? separating and distinguishing it from the "shadow?" Around the Decalogue such a line was drawn. The precepts of it were spoken by Jehovah himself. They were written by God's own finger. The giving of them was attended with thunderings, and lightnings, and the noise of trumpet, and the smoking of the mountain. They were deposited in the Ark, where none of the ceremonial law was placed; and covered by the Mercy Seat, which was the throne of God's glory. Did these circumstances signify nothing? Add to these, that on the great day of Atonement, that festival which so strikingly typified the great Propitiation, the blood of the sin-offering was sprinkled upon the Mercy Seat, under which the Decalogue was deposited, as if to teach the people that their sins, from which the atonement typically cleansed them, were against that very code of duty. We ask again, Did all this signify nothing? In our view, it amounts to little less than demonstration, that the Decalogue was the law by which God convicted the Jews of sin, and made them feel their need of a Redeemer.

The law which served this purpose under the Mosaic dispensation, serves the same purpose under the gospel. It must necessarily be the everlasting rule of righteousness, and is, therefore, a complete transcript of the law which was given to, or rather written in the heart of, the first man. It is the law which was in Christ's heart, (Ps. 40: 8,) and is the one which was written in the hearts of all Christ's people. Jer. 31: 33. The Spirit writes it there. Why will they grieve and quench the Spirit by living in disobedience to the fourth of its precepts?

GLASGOW. November 1st, 1850.

The Pope's Bull for the territorial division of England into Popish Bishopricks, (for Scotland is not embraced in the scheme,) continues to excite much attention of the Press. It is contended, that it is an infringement upon the law which gives supremacy in all matters ecclesiastical to the Queen. But it seems to be overlooked, that although England rejected the supremacy of the Pope at the Reformation, the Pope did not then renounce that supremacy. However rebellious we have been considered at the Vatican, right to our allegiance has always been maintained there. It now even turns out that we have been mercifully dealt with in this respect; for, instead of visiting us with all the severity which our case might be conceived to justify, Mr. Oakely, one of the English perverts, explains this week, that we have hitherto been treated as heathens, having missionaries sent among us to labor for our conversion. This having been in so considerable a degree effected, and so many devoted members of the Church of Rome being amongst us, his Popeship is pleased to send them Bishops for their more perfect guidance. In this communication, he states that there are more Papists in London than in Rome, and that one-third of the population of Liverpool is of that communion. If so, so much greater is the pity. It is sad to think how many really have committed their souls' well-being to a system of awful delusion; and that others, though still standing separate from her actual communion, are in heart at one with Rome, in even the worst of her dogmas; and that even those who cry out most against both, yet retain with pertinacity the institutions of her dark degeneracy.

Notwithstanding, however, of the Pope's rescript against "the godless" Queen's Colleges of Ireland, and the condemnatory address of her priesthood assembled in secret conclave for the consideration of it, the attendance of Roman Catholic students at the colleges at the opening of the present session, does not seem to have been thereby diminished. It is in fact stated, that the number who have matriculated is greater than at the same season last year. But it is proposed to have a Romish University in Ireland—and subscriptions for the purpose have been commenced. Should they succeed in this, their students will of course be withdrawn from those of Government. But, accustomed as we are to the plotting and planning of Rome's agents, it is not improbable that both the Rescript and Synodical Address are but part of a scheme of intimidation, with the design of procuring some farther concession in their favor.

One of the Popish-Protestant arguments in favor of Sunday observance, is its alledged universality. We are reminded, that in all Christian communities, Papal as well as Protestant, it has found the sanction of universal acceptance. The argument might with more propriety be advanced in favor of heathenism; and was equally good when used by Papists against Luther, when contending for justification by faith—nay, still is equally good in reference to this cardinal doctrine, against all Protestants. But as so much weight is attached to the extent of the apostacy, it is well to keep before the eye of all who would use such an argument, what the kind of Sunday observance is over a large extent of its witness-field—the nature of the observance by its Popish patrons. With this view, the practices on the Continent of Europe have been referred to. The practice of papal Peru, as now amended by law, is even more remarkable. The Glasgow Herald, this week, gives the translation of an official paper dated Lima, June 27th, 1850, which serves to elucidate this point. It is addressed generally, "To the Prefect of this Department," as if to guide the Prefect in each, and states that "whereas it has been the custom to fight cocks on all days of the year," the Government has ordered that there be henceforth no "cock-fighting for gambling purposes EXCEPT on the afternoon of Sundays," and on a few other occasions. Sunday is thus to be a venerated day! In honor of our Lord's resurrection, the cock-fighting for gambling purposes is to be allowed on Sunday, but not "on all days of the year," as profanely has been permitted hitherto! So says this authority—part, be it observed, of that universal testimony to which appeal is so usually made by those who so justify their trampling under foot Heaven's Sabbath Law.

Two winged messengers have been said to have arrived in the west of Scotland from the Arctic regions. Sir John Ross is stated to have been presented, previous to his starting in search of Sir John Franklin, with two pairs of carrier pigeons, by a lady in Ayrshire. One pair has been supposed to have arrived, and caught near the place whence they were taken; and the information assumed from a preconcerted signal, (for the birds bear no written message,) is that Ross was inclosed in the ice. Doubts rest on the statement, as the birds had nothing of the usual training of progressive distances, and no instance is known, we believe, of a pigeon, even with these advantages, having returned half the distance which this would imply, if correct. Six hundred miles is said to be the greatest journey achieved; while the point where Ross may be supposed from latest accounts to be, cannot be supposed to be less than 2000 miles from Ayr. The interest taken in the result of the search may lead to erroneous conjectures being readily accepted as truths.

The Crystal Palace for the London Industrial Exhibition, is progressing satisfactorily, and the contractors still expect to roof in the whole by New-Year's Day. In the beginning of this week, 200 glaziers commenced operations; and so well is the whole work adjusted, that each man can glaze 64 feet daily. It is now formally urged, that it should be allowed to remain as a London Winter Garden. The Britania Railway Bridge, over the Menai Strait, is now open for traffic, and giving full satisfaction.

THE FUGITIVE SLAVE LAW.

To the Editors of the Sabbath Recorder:—

I have noticed some articles in your paper of late, expressing in very decided terms the sentiments of the writers on the law for the recovery of Fugitive Slaves. I suppose the readers of the Recorder are not unlike others in their views and feelings on this subject. A general disapprobation is evident throughout the Free States, and although there are many who believe that the law was necessary for the peace of the nation, many, very many, believe, on the contrary, that it is a fruitful source of disaffection and strife, and, perhaps more than any other act of Congress since the adoption of the Constitution, will tend to hasten the catastrophe sought to be averted by its enactment.

It is, without doubt, a grave and important subject, and should be treated as such. For a long time we have deplored the evil of slavery, not merely as a political evil, but as a moral wrong, deep and unmitigated. This political evil, and outrage on the principles of liberty and humanity, we have been taught to believe, was beyond the reach of Congress, and securely intrenched in the South behind the Constitution which secured to the several States their own and "peculiar institutions." Christians and friends of humanity in the Free States, were permitted only to pray that the yoke might be broken, and the oppressed might go free; but they were not permitted by the powers that be to petition Congress to avert the evil or mitigate the wrongs of the enslaved, or in any wise to advert to the institution, even in the District and Territories of the Union, because, forsooth, Congress could not legislate on the subject. The inconsistency of the law in question is therefore the more apparent, because they have not only legislated on the subject, but have so legislated that our political Wm. Tells, and our conscientious moral and religious protestants, who deprecate the evil, are by fine or imprisonment required to contribute to extend the wrongs by their own hands, and are debarred from exercising the first principles of their religion—the duties of humanity and hospitality to the unfortunate fugitive from oppression. It was thought enough that the oppressor was permitted to overtake the fugitive, and after legally proving his relation, to return him to bondage from the soil of freedom; but beyond endurance, when he is permitted to press into his detestable service those whose sense of justice and religion revolts at the deed.

I believe that the friends of the UNION, as they are called, have overdone the work; and it will become the duty of good citizens opposed to usurpation, and honest Christians who will not submit to become the aiders and abettors of the wrongs they deprecate, to send up a flood of petitions to Congress at the next session, to repeal or modify this law, and not to attempt to enforce on them a work which their religion forbids, and at which their sense of humanity revolts. But we should be careful to refrain from unreasonable denunciation, or from threatening resistance to the laws and the powers that be. Leave this to politicians and statesmen, but Christians will act like Christians when their principles are put to the test.

DISAGREEMENT AMONG DOCTORS.

On Sunday evening, Nov. 10th, John Hughes, by some styled "the Right Reverend and Venerable, the Archbishop of New York," delivered a lecture on Protestantism, at St. Patrick's Cathedral in this city, in which he set forth that 'Protestantism is declining, that the body which represents its principle is breaking into all manner of sects and fragments, that some are going from it to Rationalism and avowed Infidelity, and others are returning to the Catholic doctrine, while amid this confusion and jangle of sects the Romish Church stands majestic and serene, with its orders and hierarchies, and its two hundred millions of obedient subjects, awaiting the return of the repentant nations to their allegiance.' On the same evening, by some strange coincidence, John Dowling, D.D., author of a History of Romanism, delivered a lecture in New York on the "Rise and Downfall of Popery," in which he set forth some of the changes Popery had wrought, and then showed that it was declining in its influence, without any reasonable ground of hope that it would ever recover, while Protestantism was gradually gaining strength, and was certain finally to triumph.

Such disagreement among doctors might puzzle a candid inquirer in deciding what is the truth. No doubt there is much which passes for Protestantism that is declining, for we are told by Jesus Christ that every plant which the Heavenly Father hath not planted shall be rooted up. But he who thinks the fundamental doctrine of Protestantism, that "the Bible is the only rule of faith and practice," is losing its hold upon the confidence and affections of men, must surely close his eyes against the facts which are daily transpiring in the world. There never was a time when this doctrine was more generally felt to be the only safe foundation upon which to build. Hence it is, that many of the practices of Protestants, which do not agree with the word of God, are falling into disuse. If all such were discarded, Protestantism would have nothing to fear from the attacks, open or covert, of Romanism. While however, Protestants hold on to their Romish customs, such as sprinkling for baptism, and keeping Sundays in place of the Sabbath, there is reason for fear, and room to question which system will come off victorious.

CHANGING TIMES AND LAWS.

To the Editors of the Sabbath Recorder:—

In Dr. Dowling's discourse at Hope Chapel, last Sunday week, he stated, as a proof that the Roman Church had changed times and laws, in accordance with the prophecy of Daniel concerning the "little horn," that the Catholic Church had exalted saints' days, and depressed the "Lord's day;" and, as a proof, he referred his hearers to the condition of Sunday in Catholic countries as compared with it in Protestant countries. He might have charged the "little horn" with the changing of the Sabbath day into a saint's day with more propriety; but that would be going too far, perhaps, and might condemn himself as an accessory after the fact. But what a change was made? The Catholic Church are awfully guilty of depressing the Sunday festival, while Protestants exalt it; in other words, Protestants go a little farther in changing the commandment than the Romans, inasmuch as they make more of the festival substituted for the Sabbath than the Romans do! Had the Doctor said plainly, that the "little horn" had changed the fourth commandment into a human law enforcing the heathen festival of the Sun in place of the Sabbath, and to commemorate another event than the one originally indicated by the Law-giver, he would have said something like the truth, and furnished some better argument for his cause. Is not this "daubing with untempered mortar?"

LUTHER.

"MEN OF THE RIGHT STAMP."—A correspondent of the American Home Missionary Society, in representing the wants of his presbytery, begs for "a young man of the right stamp," one who can "get upon a log, a stump, in a stable, barn, old log school house, or any where, and be always ready to preach, like a Methodist circuit rider, under all circumstances, to many or few"—one who can take it "rough and ready" over the prairies, and can "sleep any way, eat any thing, and drink cold water;" and they want this kind of men "all through the country."

A WRITTEN LANGUAGE IN WESTERN AFRICA.—One of the Sierra Leone agents of the Church Mission Society of London, Rev. Mr. Koelle, has discovered a written language existing in the interior of West Africa—the Vy language. Mr. Koelle says that the alphabet consists of about one hundred letters, each representing a syllable. The new characters are said to have no analogy with any other known. Mr. Koelle has taken passage on board a vessel going to the nearest point from which the Vy nation can be reached, with the resolution to investigate fully this interesting discovery.

SABBATH EVENING CONCERTS.

Under the fictitious title of "Sacred Concerts," musical entertainments are given every Sabbath evening at Tripler Hall, at which Madame Bishop and Mr. Boschi are the prominent performers. We call the title of these performances fictitious—for who imagines that there is the least thought or feeling of sacredness in the minds of those engaged in them? They are mere musical entertainments, designed for the pecuniary profit of certain professional singers and instrumental performers in whom piety is not quite as conspicuous as musical talent and accomplishments. To be sure the Stabat Mater and like pieces are selected for the performance, but all this, as well as the name sacred, is but a veil to cover a breach of the Sabbath which would otherwise offend the moral sense of the community. Many, we fear, of easy consciences, are lured into these concerts, who would be shocked at the idea of attending on Sabbath evening a miscellaneous concert for professional and money-making purposes; and thus the door is opened for the introduction of all sorts of entertainments on the evenings of the Sabbath. It will be but a step from hearing Madame Bishop at Tripler Hall to hearing Madame Bishop at the Broadway Theater. Against such innovations, not Christians alone, but all who desire public order and the proper training of youth, should steadfastly set their faces.

☞ If Sunday were the Sabbath, the foregoing remarks, which we clip from the Independent, would be of wholesome tendency, and we could say Amen to them most heartily. But the title of the performances complained of is not a whit more fictitious than is the title of Sabbath when applied to the first day of the week. "Many, we fear, of easy consciences, are lured into" the Sunday observance by this fictitious title, "who would be shocked at the idea of" trampling upon the Sabbatic Institution, notwithstanding the Sunday observance leads to such profanation, and perpetuates it; for the keeping of human traditions makes void the commandments of God.

REVIVAL IN PLAINFIELD, N. J.

PLAINFIELD, N. J., Nov. 17th, 1850.

To the Editors of the Sabbath Recorder:—

I should have written a week ago, to inform you of what God has been doing in this church, or perhaps I should say congregation, as the work appears more to affect them than the church comparatively. I cannot doubt, however, that the church has been greatly blessed of late. Elder Wm. M. Jones, late of the Baptist Free Mission in Hayti, (having been ordered home by the Board that sent him out, for the reason that he did just as, before they last sent him out, he informed them that he should do, in carrying out his views in respect to the Sabbath, that is, in keeping the seventh day and teaching others to do the same,) came to stay a few days with us, and get a little acquainted with our people. When he had been here two or three days, he made his arrangements to leave; but he was repeatedly prevented by unforseen circumstances. By this time it began to be thought, from the short acquaintance had with Br. J., that his zeal, devotion, and gifts, probably, were such that he might be usefully employed among us in a special effort to promote the cause of God, if he could be retained for the object. Accordingly a request was made by our people, that he should stay a while, and labor amongst them. He and myself immmediately commenced visiting from house to house, praying and conversing with the members of the families upon the subject of personal religion, or their own individual interests in that matter. Thus we spent our time from day to day, and each evening held a meeting for preaching, exhortation, and prayer. Br. Jones, (though not a very hardy man naturally, and lately come from a hot and of course a debilitating climate,) was able to preach nearly every evening for three weeks. He also preached a number of discourses in the day time during the same period.

Suffice it to say, that we soon saw that God approved and blessed us in our undertaking; the unconverted began to feel; prayer was offered for them by the people of God; and we have had the happiness of baptizing nineteen converts, as we trust they are, and they have all been received into the church. Others, we expect, will follow their example and the command of their Lord in the same path of obedience.

Bro. Jones has left and gone to Shiloh, N. J., by a request from that church to visit them. I cannot doubt but that a man who has shown himself ready to suffer for the truth of God (as Br. Jones has) will do any people good with whom he may be permitted to labor. May the result of his visit at Shiloh, as here, justify this opinion, and God be praised therefor, and his name glorified thereby.

HOME MISSIONARY LABOR.—A missionary of the American Home Missionary Society gives the following account of the manner in which his labor is rewarded in Iowa:—

"During the last year, I have received nothing at all in money from the people with whom I labor, and but very little in provisions. The most that they have done, has been done in drawing the materials for my house. But in stating this, I do not complain of any unwillingness on their part. Those who made the most of the subscription, though farmers, have been obliged to buy grain for their own families. Eighty or eighty-five dollars, besides your commission of $200, is probably as much as I shall realize for the past year."

Another missionary, laboring in Missouri, alludes to his privations and discouragements as follows:—

"There is scarcely a comfortable boarding place within the limits of the county; I graze my horse on the prairie, write on a plank supported between two chairs, and frequently lie awake at night battling with vermin."

WESTERN COLLEGE SOCIETY.—This Society held its seventh annual meeting at Norwalk, Ct., on the 30th and 31st of October. The annual sermon was preached by Rev. Dr. Skinner of New York, and is highly spoken of. The Annual Report says that most encouraging progress has been made during the past year. Four benefactions of $10,000 each, have been made to the Society, and already more than four hundred laborers have been sent into the home and foreign field. The institutions aided last year were Marietta, Wabash, Illinois, Knox, Beloit, and Wittenberg Colleges, and Lane Theological Seminary. The receipts of the year were $17,623. In addition to this, the Rev. M. P. Squier of Geneva had given $10,000 to found a professorship in Beloit College, and Mrs. S. W. Hale, of Newburyport, lands to the value of $10,000. There had been a special subscription of $7,000 for Marietta College, making a total in the receipts of $44,623. Through exertions at the East, the different institutions have realized subscriptions in their own fields to the amount of $60,000, making a grand total for the East and West, during the past year, of more than $100,000.

MISSIONARY OPERATIONS IN THE SANDWICH ISLANDS.—Accounts recently received from the Sandwich Islands are of a mixed character, and on the whole of rather a sombre cast. The past year has been one of unusual trial; storm and tempest have laid waste portions of the islands, sweeping away the dwelling houses of the natives, and many of their meeting houses and school houses also, originally built at a vast expense of time and labor; sickness and death, too, have invaded their dwellings, and greatly diminished the population of the islands, and left many in an enfeebled condition. But while such discouragements have been pressing on the islanders, they have made some progress. Twenty of the 26 Christian churches on the islands, report an aggregate addition to their number during the year, of 815 persons, and a total of 17,211 church members. These persons, out of their deep poverty, have raised for various Christian and benevolent purposes during the year more than seven thousand dollars.

PERSECUTION OF PROTESTANTS BY ARMENIANS.—A letter from Rev. Mr. Schneider, of Aintab, details a recent outbreak of Armenian passion and bigotry in that city. A number of Armenian millers, who resided in the neighborhood of Aintab, while on a visit to the city, were induced, as they say, by the Armenian Vertabed and the principal priest of the city, to arm themselves with clubs and attack the Protestant school. They there found a Protestant Armenian priest whom they beat until he was unable to walk home, a blind teacher whom they knocked down and left for dead, and a third person whom they severely beat, but who nevertheless succeeded in escaping and giving the alarm. About twenty of the rioters were arrested by the Turkish authorities, and on examination, sentenced to imprisonment.

STATISTICS OF UNIVERSALISM.—The Universalist Companion and Register for 1851, sets down the number of Universalist clergymen in the United States at 674, societies 1077, churches 557. In the State of New York there are 204 societies, 155 churches, 129 clergymen. Massachusetts has 148 societies, 136 churches, 145 clergymen. New Jersey, 5 societies, 3 churches, 3 clergymen. Rhode Island, 10 societies, 5 churches, 6 clergymen. Connecticut, 33 societies, 27 churches, 15 clergymen, &c.

THE WAY TO MAKE COLLECTIONS.—The Independent says that the annual contribution to the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions, in the church of the Pilgrims in Brooklyn, made on a recent Sunday, amounted to about $1300. No personal solicitations were made beforehand. The cause was simply presented, as usual, by the pastor, and the collection taken. A good example of the best method of taking up contributions.

BAPTIST MISSIONS IN CANADA.—A Canadian correspondent of the Christian Watchman and Reflector gives a history of the rise and fall of Baptist missionary operations in Canada. There were two sorts of ministers, one class from the States, and the other from England. The Canadian Baptist Missionary Society was chiefly in the hands of the latter class, against whom a cry was raised that they were seeking to bring the churches to the practice of open communion. An application was made with success, by three or four ministers in Canada West, to the American Baptist Home Mission Society, to extend its operations to Canada, "to save that wide field from the heresy of open communion, and preserve in it the cherished sentiments of the American Baptists." A Baptist Union was formed, a paper established, with "an able and spirited editor from the States," and a conflict was carried on for three years between the American and the Canadian Societies, the result of which is, as this writer represents, that—

"The intelligent ministers who had toiled for years among the heterogeneous and divided population of Canada, to get the denomination together, and to coöperate at least in some things, if they could not in all, became utterly discouraged when they found the fruits of their labors scattered to the winds, and saw no prospect of harmony for years to come. Many left the country, some going to England, some to the United States, and some gave up the ministry in despair."

These are the causes which, as he asserts, have "closed the college, killed the Missionary Society, and buried every Baptist periodical in the country." Independent.

General Intelligence.

One Week Later from Europe.

By the steamers Atlantic and Cambria, we have news from Liverpool to Nov. 2d, one week later. We abridge from the N. Y. Tribune the most interesting and important items.

The political intelligence from England is not important. The reëstablishment of a Roman Catholic hierarchy in England is yet the all-engrossing topic. The conservative press and the Bishop of London are loud in denunciation. Cardinal Wiseman has issued his first pastoral. The document contains nothing new. The church of England, through her Bishops and Clergy, seconded by several of the leading journals of the country, is calling for penal enactments to extinguish the new titles assumed by the Hierarchy. A deputation of the Clergy had waited upon the Bishop of London, to present an address previously determined upon at Zion College. The deputation was cordially received by the Bishop, who expressed his entire satisfaction with the nature of the address, and strongly urged that every Parish should at once prepare and forward an address to the Throne at this critical period. The Standard states, on high authority, that Her Majesty was most anxious to receive the address of her loyal people, and ready to sustain their uncompromising determination to resist this impudent interference with her authority.

From France we hear of a great conspiracy, including most if not all of the Provinces of both East and West, accompanied by rumors of mischief to pay at Paris and elsewhere. M. Gent, a radical Member of the late National Assembly, has been arrested at Lyons on account of this conspiracy. The whole story may be true, but it is also possible that it is an invention of the Police preparatory to the meeting of the Legislative Assembly, and designed to bring the members of that body to the proper frame of mind with reference to the schemes of Louis Napoleon. The appointment of Gen. Schramm to the office of Minister of War, has not led to a better understanding between the Prince and General Changanier. There have been, in fact, greater disputes than ever. Schramm and Changanier have had a serious quarrel. Snow has fallen in large quantities at Bourg, Orleans, and Sombernon, in the Côte d'Or, where the vintage is not yet all gathered, and at Rouen.

The principal news from Germany is that Prussian troops have entered the Electorate of Hesse, marching upon the roads which they have a right to use according to the treaties of 1815. They are commanded by Gen. Von Groben, who announces that he is charged with the duty of repelling military intervention in the Electorate. It is said that they do not intend to remain there, but are merely marching through to Thuringa; but this may be so or not, according to circumstances.

In Schleswig-Holstein there has been a skirmish near Rendsburg, but no decisive fighting. A few squadrons of Danish cavalry were beaten back by the Holsteiners, the latter losing seven killed. It is thought that the Danish forces are preparing for some important movement. On the other hand, we learn from Denmark that a cessation of hostilities had been come to, neither party hoping for any advantage therefrom, and that matters would be settled by arbitration. It is also reported, that the Berlin Cabinet has recommended the Duchies to negotiate for peace, which is more than likely.

From Portugal we hear of the death of the Duke of Palmella. He died at Lisbon, Oct. 12, in the 69th year of his age. He was a lineal descendant of Alphonse III. King of Portugal, and also of the ducal house of Holstein, and filled a large space in the history of his country with the record of his acts.

From Russia we are informed of the loss, probably in the Baltic sea, of the Emperor's war steam ship Archimedes. The disaster happened in the course of the night of Oct. 18th, and the number of men perished is reported to be 18. The ship was a new vessel, and, with armament, cost the country £80,000. In the province of Lithunia the landed proprietors of the class of nobility are falling rapidly into poverty. Almost every number of the official journals of the province contains the announcement of the sale of the estates of insolvent proprietors. In many other Governments of Russia the class of nobles includes individuals who have become impoverished. According to an official report made to the Minister of the Interior, there were in 29 Governments 29,148 proprietors of the class of nobles whose whole possessions were confined to 25 serfs, and in many cases a less number. In the same Governments there are many noble families who own only half a "dessatine" of land, or about two acres English, without serfs attached to it. To assist these impoverished families as far as possible, the Government has resolved to settle them on the Crown lands of the Governments of Simbrisk and Tobolsk. On account of their inability to educate their children, one son from each family is entered in the battalions of the military colonies.

Wm. L. Chaplin.—Mr. Chaplin's case came on at Rockville, Md., last week. The Grand Jury presented seven indictments, three charging Chaplin with assault and battery with attempt to kill, two for larceny of Toombs' and Stevens' slaves, and two for assisting the slaves to escape. The Court at Rockville having refused to admit Chaplin to bail, affidavits were filed by him affirming that he could not obtain a fair trial in that Court, and claiming a change of venue. His application was granted, and the case ruled to the spring term of the Harvard District Court. The Court fixed the amount of bail at $19,000.

New York Election.—The official returns from the various counties of the State of New York show that Washington Hunt, the Whig candidate for Governor, is elected by about 500 majority. The Democratic nominees for other State offices were elected. The Legislature is said to be strongly Whig. The Free School Law was sustained by a majority of from twenty-five to thirty thousand.

Southern Convention.—A Convention of Southerners, to discuss the proper course for the South to pursue in view of the Slavery agitation, was in session at Nashville four days of last week. Great diversity of opinion existed among its members—some being for immediate secession, and others thinking there is no cause for such a movement. On Sabbath last, the Select Committee on Resolutions reported a preamble and resolution which were ordered to be printed, and the vote upon which will be looked for with interest. The drift of the document is thus stated in a telegraphic dispatch to the N. Y. Tribune :—

The preamble declares, that individual States have residuary rights, and that the people of the several States are not as one people united for certain purposes. They are all equal—each State has a right to judge of an infringement upon it by the other States, and has a right to secede peaceably. Any attempt to coerce the seceding States into the measures of the majority is a gross assumption of power; and the South is recommended, in case any one State should secede, to support that State. All the anticipated evils, for the consideration of which this Convention has been called, have been fully realized. The South has been degraded by the virtual extension of the Wilmot proviso over California, and the exclusion of slavery from Utah and New Mexico. Not satisfied with California, Utah, and New Mexico, Congress has bought—under a threat of bringing down the militia if she refused to sell—territory from the State of Texas, for the purpose of making that also free. Not only this—Congress has likewise interfered with Slavery in the District of Columbia.

The resolution recommends the calling of a Congress of the South, to meet in Montgomery, Ala., for the purpose of consulting as to what course shall be pursued by the Southern States for the maintenance of their rights and institutions.

Disgraceful Row in Boston.

The New York papers of last Sabbath morning give the details of a most disgraceful row which took place at Faneuil Hall, in Boston, on the previous evening. We copy the account with emotions of indignation and shame.

The meeting in Fanueil Hall for the reception of Geo. Thompson was very large, and the galleries contained many ladies. Edmund Quincy presided. When Mr. Thompson entered the Hall, he was greeted with shouts of applause from his friends mingled with hisses.

Wm. Lloyd Garrison commenced the proceedings by reading the address of reception, containing a history of Mr. Thompson's movements in the Anti-Slavery cause in England and this country, and concluded by stating that just fifteen years ago he was obliged to fly clandestinely from this country, but, said the speaker, "The Boston of 1835 is not the Boston of 1850. The Massachusetts of 1850 is not the Massachusetts of 1835." [Loud cheers.]

Toward the close of Mr. Garrison's remarks, the meeting began to be disorderly, and when he had finished many cheers were given for Daniel Webster and the Union.

Wendell Phillips next ascended the platform, but was greeted with groans, hisses, and exclamations which completely drowned his voice. Loud cheers were again given for the Union, Daniel Webster, and for Gov. Briggs and Jenny Lind! Mr. Phillips appealed to them to hear Mr. Thompson, and wipe off the stain of 1835, when Boston drove him off as a fugitive. He then retired, and Mr. Thompson took the stand, but instantly the Hall became a perfect bedlam of noise and confusion. He tried to speak, but in vain. Cheers were reiterated for the Union and for Webster, intermingled with groans, cat calls, and hisses. After remaining upon the stand for some time, he bowed to the audience, and was about to retire, but his friends would not permit him. A chair was handed him, and he sat down fronting the audience.

From this time the rioters had it all their own way. Groans were given for John Bull, a ring was formed on the floor, and one or two commenced to dance.

Abby Kelly was called for and endeavored to speak; but after uttering a few sentences, stopped.

Rev. Henry Channing next appeared, but his voice was drowned in hisses and outcries.

Rev. Theodore Parker then ascended the platform. He pointed to the pictures of Washington, Adams, and others, and endeavored to make himself heard, but the cries were redoubled.

The President of the meeting at this point came forward and shook hands with Mr. Thompson, and retired amidst thunders of applause. All this time there was no attempt made at violence, and the ladies in the galleries remained quiet spectators of the scene.

After a consultation between the friends of the meeting, it was deemed proper to adjourn, which was declared by the President, but the noise still continued. Frederick Douglass then ascended the platform and appealed to them to hear a fugitive slave speak. The audience would not hear him. The gas was then partially turned down, and the hall being in a state of semi-darkness, the scene was quite picturesque. Above stood the stalwart frame of Frederick Douglass, waving his hands aloft and occasionally crying out to be heard; and below was the vast audience, swaying about, and uttering cries of every description, Mr. Thompson having previously left. Shouting and cheering still continued, but the audience commenced dispersing. A police officer here appeared on the platform and said that he was ordered by the City Marshall to request the audience to retire. By 9½ o'clock, the hall was wholly cleared, but a large crowd waited outside, apparently for Thompson. As a carraige drew [illegible] and a man got in, supposed to be hi[illegible] groans were given for John Bull, a[illegible]ome added, let him not interfere in our affairs, and the carriage drove off. It did not, however, contain Thompson. This ended the scene.

The Mayor and Marshal are much blamed by some for not putting a stop to the disorderly scene in the Hall, but they urge the impossibility of interfering effectually in a hall crowded with such a vast mass of excited people, more especially as no overt act of violence was attempted. The Police and Watch were, however, ready to protect Mr. Thompson, at all hazards, from any personal outrage. The speech that Mr. Thompson was to have delivered will be published.

Attempt to Kidnap, or Otherwise.

Bishop, a colored man, who has been in this State some two or three years, perhaps longer, was at work in his blacksmith shop, near the Beech Wood's Factory, on Friday of last week. A horseman rode up, and asked him to examine his horse's foot, and see what ailed it. He looked at one foot, and could find nothing the matter, and was requested to examine another. By this time some four or five strangers had come up, and Bishop, not liking the appearance of things, stepped back into the shop as if to get some tool, and instead of returning, went through the back door into the adjoining field, and started across the field.

He was pursued by some on foot, and some on horseback, across the fields and over fences, and through cornstalks, weeds and brush. Bishop ran to where a farmer, who was hauling a load of corn, had loosed his horses. By the time he arrived one of the pursuers was close on him. Bishop mounted one of the horses belonging to the team, and as he mounted he was shot at some three or four times by the man, who, by this time was within a few feet of him. He returned the fire, and lodged a bullet against a pistol in the breeches pocket of the enemy.

But, to cut the story short, Bishop escaped. The Fugitive Law and its myrmidons were insufficient for his capture.

It is said that Bishop is the slave of a Mr. Campbell, of Nicholas Co., Ky., who was one of the company in pursuit. But the fact that one of them falsely represented himself to be a United States Marshal, and under pretense that he had a warrant for the arrest of Bishop, commanded citizens of Ohio to aid in his arrest, and even presented a pistol to the breast of one of them who refused to obey him, causes the whole affair to be looked upon with suspicion.

Shooting with intent to kill, even at a fugitive, we suppose, is, under the laws of Ohio, a Penitentiary offense. [Ripley Bee.

Awful Murder.—About three o'clock yesterday morning, says the N. Y. Tribune of Nov. 16, Mr. Charles M. Rosseau, a native of Belgium, 66 years of age, was murdered at his residence No 51 Dey Street, by a man named Henry Carnal. Two sons of the murdered man, Charles and Louis, the former 20, and the latter 22 years of age, were also dreadfully cut and stabbed, and in all probability fatally wounded, by the same individual. The particulars of this awful tragedy are as follows: The old man and his sons kept a beer shop at No. 51 Dey Street, and were in the habit of receiving occasional calls from Carnal, who is a fellow-countryman. This man by some means ascertained that the old man had about $300 laid aside in the house, and the murder was probably committed with a view of obtaining possession of this money. On Thursday evening, a little before 9 o'clock, Carnal arrived from Newark, N. J., and applied to Mr. Rouseau for supper, and permission to remain at the house all night. The old man at first refused, but his sons finally persuaded him to accede to the request, and gave Carnal permission to sleep in their room. The family retired about half-past 9 o'clock. About 3 o'clock in the morning Carnal arose, and taking a large dirk-knife which he had in his pocket stabbed Louis in the abdomen, inflicting an awful gash, from which the entrails immediately protruded. The shrieks of the wounded man awoke his brother, whom the fiend seized and struck in the neck and side with the weapon. The father, who slept in an adjoining room, was also awakened by the cries, jumped up and ran to the room from whence the noise proceeded; he was met by Carnal, who stabbed him in the neck, severing the jugular vein. The three wounded men then fled out of the house and gave the alarm; officer McCullough of the 3d Ward was soon on the spot, and found the old man lying upon the pavement dead, with his head resting upon the lap of one of his sons. A physician was immediately called, and dressed the wounds of the two young men, and they were then removed to the Hospital. The wretch who perpetrated this awful crime was not discovered until daylight, when he was found in the back area of the house which he had got into, but in consequence of its great depth was unable to get out. In his efforts to extricate himself, he had fallen several times, cut himself badly and dislocated one of his wrists. He was committed to prison.

The Wreck of the Steamer Lexington.—The Boston Mail says: Messrs. J. Gowen & Co., submarine contractors and operators of this city, have recently returned from an exploration of the steamer Lexington, which was burned and sunk off Huntington Light, on Long Island Sound, about three miles distant from the Connecticut shore. The wreck was found in 21 fathoms of water, or 126 feet below the surface; the hull was found completely "honey-combed" by worms, lying by a reef of sand which had been thrown up by the current, running N. E. and S. W. Their object was the recovery of a safe containing the sum of $80,000 in bills and gold. They have succeeded in raising one of her anchors, and the anchor and cable of another company who had made an unsuccessful attempt upon the wreck; they also recovered portions of the machinery, some gold and copper, and human bones of the ill-fated passengers. They are sanguine of recovering the safe as soon as the weather will permit.

Damages.—Catharine Murray vs. New Jersey Railroad and Transportation Company.—This was an action brought for the recovery of damages by the plaintiff, then a child of 10 years, for having, on the 3d of December, 1848, had her foot crushed so as to require amputation above the ancle, in consequence of dropping down with one foot in the open space or gap some 8 inches or a foot wide between the steamboat and the bridge or dock, as the boat was coming up on the New York side of the Ferry from Jersey City to Cortland-st., owned and managed by the Railroad Company under lease. The Judge charged the Jury, that if they believed the keeping up of the chain was necessary to the protection of the passengers, and that the same was down before the boat was secured to the dock, and when the accident occured, they should find for the plaintiff. The Jury accordingly found for the plaintiff $2,000 damages. [N. Y. Tribune.

Distressing Accident—Seven Lives Lost.—We learn from the Exchange Reading Room Books, says the Baltimore American of Nov. 13, that yesterday morning, between 8 and 9 o'clock, the schr. Cornelia A. Crook, Grant, while off the White Rocks, about six miles below this port, saw a number of canal boats drifting toward the shore, having on board of them a number of men who were making signs of distress. Notwithstanding it was blowing a pretty severe gale from the N. E. at the time, the schooner's boat was promptly lowered, and into it jumped the mate, named Geo. Smith, two seamen, and a brother of Capt. Grant, who immediately pushed off to the assistance of those on board the canal boats and succeeded in rescuing eight of them; with whom they returned to the schooner; but while in the act of getting on board, the boat was capsized, consigning to a watery grave seven of those whom it contained, including the mate and the Captain's brother, who thus perished while in the act of saving others.

Another Arrest of Fugitives not made in Detroit.—Two gentlemen from the South, says the Detroit Tribune of Nov. 5, arrived in Chicago on Friday last, in pursuit of two female fugitive slaves. Unfortunately for them, however, the colored ladies had, a few hours previous, left that city, in the steamer Niagara. Nothing daunted, the Southerners took the first boat for New Buffalo, and thence by railroad to this city. The friends of the fugitives, hearing of the departure of the gentlemen for Detroit, immediately telegraphed to some friends here to be on the look out and protect the women. Provision was immediately made by some of our colored population, and yesterday a steamer was chartered and sent up the river, to meet the Niagara, take off the fugitives, and land them in Her Majesty's dominions in Canada.

Trouble with the Western Indians.—A dispatch from Kanesville, Mo., states that a tremendous conflagration has occurred in that region, caused by the Omaha Indians, who set on fire the dry grass on the prairie. The wind was very high at the time, and the flames spread with such rapidity that a great many of the fences, outstanding crops, and some buildings, for miles around, were enveloped in one sheet of fire. The Indians, just previous to the conflagration, were discovered in the act of setting fire to the prairie in a number of different places. The Omahas inhabit a portion of the Missouri territory, some sixty miles above Fort Leavenworth. They are described as one of the most dangerous and treacherous of the Indian tribes, and will be likely to cause the pioneers of the backwoods a great deal of trouble.

SUMMARY.

A dispatch dated Utica, N.Y., Nov. 11, says: Capt. Hiram Greenman, one of our most esteemed citizens, died this morning. He was for many years the Captain of the Schenectady and Rochester Packet Co., and had filled several important stations in this city, and had by his enterprise and energy contributed largely to the successful operation of the numerous Public Works for which Utica is distinguished.

The schrs. Telegraph and the S. F. Gale came in collision a few nights since on Lake Huron, about five miles from Bois Blanc—the latter carried away the bulwarks of the former vessel, and those on board the Telegraph did not know what vessel they had struck, so rapidly did she sink; it was only 15 minutes from the time they discovered each other's lights till the Gale went down The crew got to Mackinaw in the smal boat.

A few evenings ago, as Mr. Arcularius and his brother-in-law, Mr. Nathaniel Saltonstall, Jr., were on their way to New London, in the steamboat, the former went down to supper, leaving his companion on deck. On returning, in the course of half an hour, Mr. Saltonstall was missing, and since then nothing has been heard of him. His hat was found on the deck, and there is every reason to believe that in a rash moment he threw himself overboard and was drowned.

One of our Exchanges says, that Mrs. Swisshelm, Editor of the Pittsburgh Saturday Visitor, and her whole family of eleven persons, were poisoned recently at dinner, but they do not know exactly how. Mrs. S. herself had taken part in preparing the turkey in which they suppose the poison was concealed. They are all recovering except a servant woman, whom Mrs. S. does not expect to survive.

In the case of the recent fatal explosion on board of the steamer "Telegraph," near New Castle, Md., the Coroner's jury have rendered a verdict. The cause of the explosion is attributed to the bad condition of the steam chimney, and the jury censure the Company's superintendent of machinery, for not condemning that portion of the boiler, when some two or three weeks previous to the accident he examined it.

Mr. L. Huntington Young, now resident at Washington, D.C., is the lucky individual to whom the legacy left by the late Colonel Daniel of Liverpool, is to fall. Mr. Y. was a bookseller in New Haven at the time specified by Col. Daniel. The amount he will receive is near two millions of dollars.

An accident occurred on the railroad near Auburn, on Wednesday, by which two men were seriously—one, it is feared, fatally—injured. It seems that two men were riding in a lumber wagon on the track of the railroad when they were overtaken and their wagon run over by the cars. Their horses were killed.

The editor of the Wilmington (N. C.) Commercial states that he has seen part of an experimental crop of tobacco, raised in that neighborhood, from Spanish seed. It is very superior, and the specimen warrants the belief that the sand-hills of North Carolina, under proper cultivation, will produce as fine tobacco as any country in the world.

A dispatch dated Baltimore, Nov. 11, says: Thomas Moody, one of the party charged with killing Edmund Mitchell on Election night, was bailed out of jail to-day, and at nine o'clock to-night was shot dead by William Stewart (a bosom friend of Mitchell's,) in the gallery of the Front-street Theater.

The St. Louis Intelligencer, of Nov. 4, says: Three supposed fugitive slaves were brought down on the steamer New England a trip or two since. They were arrested in the country back of Quincy, Illinois, and at the time of their capture were making tracks for the Canadas. We learn they had been absent from their owners some time, and up to the time of the passage of the fugitive slave bill deemed themselves safe with the Mississippi alone between themselves and their owners.

The steamer Fashion has arrived at New Orleans from Tampico, bringing the following Indians as delegates from Arkansas: Sam. Jones, old wife, his young wife and queen, three children, a slave of the queen's, the wife of Kolsabajo and four children, John Philips, interpreter, Fatima his wife, and Jan Phillips, his son.

Mr. Geo. Griswold, wife and small child, and a lad about 17 years of age, were driven out into Lake Superior from Eagle Harbor, in an open skiff, recently, and after being exposed for seven days and nights without food, were picked up by a coasting schooner on the Canada shore, nearly dead.

The Quebec Mercury states that a short time since, in the Parish of St. Croix, a woman having occasion to leave her house early in the morning, made a fire in her stove, leaving her four children in bed. The house took fire, and the four children were burned to death.

A dispatch dated Montrose, Friday, Nov. 15, says: Two accidents occurred on the Legget's Gap Railroad yesterday, by premature discharges in the operation of blasting some rocks. Three men were killed and several others severely wounded.

We learn from the Lowell Courier, that within the past year, there have been discharged from the various manufacturing establishments in that city, 2,378 hands. Looms have been stopped to the number of 2,272, and monthly payments to operatives have decreased $33,404 56.

Two new connections of the Erie Railroad with the centre line of roads are now under contract—one from Hornellsville to Attica, and one from Corning through the Conhocton Valley to Batavia, which will probably be continued to the Niagara River.

The Rocky Bar Mining Company of the Middle Fork of the American River, California, has declared a semi-annual dividend of one hundred per cent. payable on the 5th of December, at the office of the Company in this city.

James Downs and his sister were crossing the railroad track in a carriage between the Newington and New Britain stations, late on the evening of the 14th instant, when the train came along and ran against them. Both were killed. The horse was also killed.

The U. S. sloop of war Yorktown, Marston, is reported lost, with seven British vessels, on the north part of St. Jago, Cape de Verde islands, on the 25th Sept. Crews saved.

A dispatch dated Hartford, Nov. 14, says that a portion of the bridge across the Connecticut river at that place fell, and that twenty-four head of cattle which were on the bridge at the time, went down with it.

The Yarmouth (Mass.) Register states that a boy about five years of age, son of Mr. Washburn Baker, of West Yarmouth, was murdered in a fit of rage by a young man named Chase.

The Columbus (Ga.) Sentinel regales itself with the following pleasant language: "We frankly tell you, that so far as we are concerned, we despise the Union and hate the North as we do hell itself."

A correspondent of the Louisville Journal writes from Frankfort that Col. R. M. Johnson is laboring under an attack of dementia, which renders him totally unfit for business.

The population of the city of Schenectady, in 1845, was 6,555; in 1850, 8,922. The county, in 1845, 16,630; in 1850, 20,056. Increase within the last five years, 3,426.

Proclamation,

By Hamilton Fish, Governor of the State of N. Y.

The mercies of an all-kind Providence call for an acknowledgment of gratitude and of dependence from the creatures of his bounties.

The year which is about to close has been marked by innumerable blessings to us as a Nation. Abundant harvest and profitable labor have brought rich rewards to honest industry. Peace and tranquility are established at home; and no discord disturbs our relations abroad. Health, prosperity, and abundance, have been freely vouchsafed to us. Civil and religious liberty prevail throughout the length and breadth of the land. And to us all is secured the free exercise of the worship of their Creator according to their own faith. And on this occasion we should not forget, that while an inscrutable Providence has seen fit to remove during the past year the Chief Magistrate of our Union, that same Providence has preserved us under the trial a free and united People, has saved us from anarchy or civil commotion, and has continued to us the mild operation of a Government of our own adoption and rulers of our own choice.

I do, therefore, designate and recommend THURSDAY, the twelfth day of December next, to be observed by the good People of this State as a day of Public Thanksgiving to Almighty God.

In witness whereof I have hereunto subscribed my name and affixed the Privy Seal of the State, [L. S.] at the City of Albany, the 31st day of October, one thousand eight hundred and fifty.

By the Governor, HAMILTON FISH.

The Late John McDonogh.

The New Orleans Delta furnishes the annexed notice of the life and character of the late John McDonogh, of whom and his immense bequests, much has been said of late.

This gentleman, the wealthiest citizen in the South, and perhaps in the United States, died at his residence, in McDonoghville, opposite the city. Mr. McDonogh had reached the age of seventy-two. Though his great vigor of mind and energy of spirit enabled him to triumph for a while over physical debility, and to pursue within a few hours of his death the industrious and busy habits which he had praticed for fifty years, his health had been declining for several months, and the termination of his earthly career was daily looked for by himself as well as by his friends. Two days ago we saw him in our streets, engaged in earnest negotiation and discussion with a brother millionaire respecting some settlement which he desired to consummate ere he was called hence, and overheard him say, in words which fell upon our ears with force and emphasis, "My days are numbered, and my affairs must all be settled this side of the grave." The constitution of Mr. McDonogh was severely taxed by his habits of close, concentrated, and wearing labor. A few months ago he told us that he devoted eighteen hours per day to labor, and regretted that he could not spare a few minutes to read the newspapers. His labors, consisted in keeping the accounts, deeds, papers, and vouchers of the most extensive landed property owned by a single individual in the world. His only assistants in these duties were some negro slaves, whom he had educated and trained in his own habits of method and industry. No white person lived in the ancient and dilapidated chateau in which he resided. No person ever visited him, save on business or for charity. His manners were rigid, severe, and repelling. Everything about his establishment partook of the spirit of the master; all was bleak, cold, dreary, and forbidding. The dogs did not bark in his yard; they cast at the passer-by a piteous, hungry look, as if they sought some kindly sympathy or notice to comfort their lean carcases; the cocks did not crow cheerily, as elsewhere, but drawled out their notes in a funereal and hollow strain, as if from empty stomachs; the merry songsters flew around, without lighting upon the dark old trees, hung with melancholy moss, which nearly concealed from view his crumbling edifice. There was no sunshine ever fell upon that spot, or upon the heart of its possessor.

Such was the abode of one who worshiped Mammon with an unceasing and all-absorbing passion, whose soul and mind were entirely monopolized by the spirit of gain, excluding every tender emotion, every ennobling feeling, every humanizing sympathy. And yet there are many familiar with the character and history of John McDonogh, who declare that the severe life he led, and his love of acquisition did not proceed from avarice, from the mere spirit of miserly acquisition, but that he had some great philanthropic purpose in view, to which he had appropriated his life and fortune, and in the pursuit of which he had hardened his soul to all the affections of humanity. This may be so. It would throw some light upon a picture otherwise dark and desolate. He was frequently heard to declare that he lived only for the Lord, to carry out some great design of his Maker. When asked if he would sell property, his invariable reply was, "I own none; what I have acquired belongs to the Lord; I am his agent, without the power of selling." He had long employed his mind, which was a remarkably sagacious one, in devising modes by which his immense property might be kept together after his death for a term of years, so that his calculations of its eventual value might be realized. He had a great passion for buying waste and swamp lands, and estimating with arithmetical precision the yearly increase in the value of those lands. A great admirer of the system of popular education, a friend to learning and Colleges, he projected also some grand schemes of education, to be maintained out of the yearly increase in the value of his lands, which were not to be sold for a certain time, but only their product applied to that purpose. He endeavored to get an act of the Legislature passed tying up his property in this manner; but it was not deemed practicable under our jurisprudence.

He was also a warm friend to the colonization enterprise. He established a colony in Africa, to which he sent many of his negroes, after giving them an education or a trade. It was his custom to allow his slaves a certain time to work for themselves. He kept accounts with each one of them, so that when the value of the work of the slave equaled his cost, he would give him his liberty, and send him to Africa. He was a hard, exacting man. In the prosecution of his rights, or in any relations of business, he knew no pity, no liberality, no kindness. What was "nominated in the bond," he would extort at every sacrifice. Involved in innumerable lawsuits, he prosecuted his rights and interests with a tenacity, vigor, and perseverance which stopped at no obstacles, and were never moderated or softened by any of the considerations that ordinarily operate upon mankind. And yet, outside of his business and legal relations, he was not insensible to charitable appeals; when properly approached he would sometimes give, we cannot say liberally, considering his means, but quite so, considering his view of his relation to the Almighty. He was self-willed and opinionated, and would only give in his own fashion, and to such undertakings as pleased his peculiar ideas. To his relations, who were quite poor, he preserved a severe and studied coldness, only relieving their poverty by the most meager contributions. Of enterprise, the spirit of public improvement and progress, he was destitute as the planks of his house were of sap. Owning immense property in the city, he left the greater part of it entirely unimproved, until his possessions became a great nuisance to the Corporation. When induced to build, he would only erect the roughest and most unseemly buildings, usually put up by his slaves, who brought the bricks with which they were made across the river. Many of these buildings are now eyesores in our city, tenantless and dangerous from their dilapidated condition. So too of his immense property in the country. But a small portion of it was in cultivation. He usually bought tracts of land by leagues and miles, instead of acres. He was said to own fifty miles fronting on the Mississippi, in Louisiana. Four-fifths of the swamp land in the State belonged to him. He had, too, immense possessions in Florida, Mississippi and Texas. The area of his property would equal that of one of the small States of the Union, and exceed that of several of the Kingdoms or Principalities of Europe. The preservation and administration of this immense property must have required a vast deal of labor and great administrative talents. These Mr. McDonogh possessed. He was well educated, wrote very well, understood the law, and was quite familiar with the history of the country. A native of Baltimore, he removed to this city in 1800, engaged in mercantile pursuits, was successful, and then embarked in the purchase of waste lands and vacant property, which he followed the balance of his life. He never left the State, never went North, but remained one of the stand-bys and originals of our city until a few hours before his death. The singularity of his appearance, in his old-fashioned blue coat, strapless pants, large white neckerchief, with green umbrella under his arm, made him one of the peculiar features of our city.

Mr. McDonogh was buried yesterday afternoon in the cemetery erected by himself, near his residence at McDonoghville, for his negroes. It was his wish that he should be buried among them. The funeral was plain and unostentatious. Prayers and a short sermon were delivered in the small church attached to the house, built for the negroes, and where the deceased himself often preached to his slaves. A very large number of persons, white and colored, were present. The coffin was placed in the plain oven-shaped tomb usual here.

On Saturday evening, C. Roselius, Esq, for 15 years the legal adviser of the deceased, appeared before Judge Buchanan, of the Fifth District Court, and informed him that Mr. McDonogh had left an olographic will, which was deposited either in the Louisiana State Bank, the Bank of Louisiana, or the Union Bank. An order of Court was issued in consequence, for any of the Cashiers of said Banks to bring the will into the Fifth District Court this morning at 10 o'clock.

Accordingly, at the above hour, the Cashier of the Union Bank, Mr. Frey, appeared, having a tin box, containing a duplicate copy of the will, with a portfolio containing memoranda for executors, notes, &c. Another copy of the will is in the possession of Mr. Joseph Montgomery, of this State. The court room was crowded. Mr. Roselius' presented the will, which was proved by Messrs. Grymes, Frey, and Grivot. The will is of twenty four foolscap pages, closely written, in the testator's own handwriting. Judge Buchanan unsealed, opened, and read it, occupying in so doing some hour's time. After leaving $6,000 and some landed property in Baltimore to his sister and her children, the deceased bequeaths his entire estate, of which he gives no aggregate amount, to the Mayors, Aldermen, and citizens of New Orleans and Baltimore, half to each city, for the purpose of establishing here a free School for poor children of all classes, and an Asylum for the poor. To the Protestant Male Orphan Asylum of this city he gives $400,000 in yearly installments. The two other Institutions' bequests are also in yearly installments.

A school farm is to be established in Baltimore and an asylum for the poor. The school farm for the education of the poor children, from 4 to 14 years of age, of Baltimore first, and the other large maritime cities of the Union. They are to be taught the pursuits of agriculture and the principles of religion. A common English education to be given in all the schools, here and at Baltimore, and the Bible to be their principal class book. The inmates of the two poor asylums to defray, as far as possible, the expenses of those institutions so far as their own labor can go. The cultivation of the mulberry tree and making of silk in these asylums are recommended. To the school farm at Baltimore the sum of $3,000,000 is bequeathed in yearly installments.

The estate, after the annuities above mentioned are paid, and a number of negroes named are freed and sent to Africa, to be managed by a certain number of commissioners appointed by this city and Baltimore; no commissioner to be a member of any council, to serve more than twelve months, or twice in succession. The two cities to act as a check on each other. None of the property ever to be sold, but to remain forever as a fund for the above charitable purposes.

A large sum is bequeathed to the American Colonization Society at Washington. After all these bequests are settled, which the donor expects to be in forty years from now, the entire estate to be divided between the States of Louisiana and Maryland, and the Legislatures to carry out the objects proposed. If the Commissioners do not follow his instructions, the estate to fall immediately to the two States. Every precaution is taken to prevent these noble bequests from being directed from their original purpose. The instructions to carry them out are full and minute.

Many high-minded and benevolent sentiments concerning education, morality, the duties of the poor and the rich, and the preservation of the Union, are to be found in the will.

The World's Fair.

The preparations making for the great Industrial Exhibition by the Committee under Prince Albert and Queen Victoria, are on the most gigantic scale. The edifice, which is to be erected in Regent's Park for the reception of articles, is to be more than 1,800 feet in length, and near 500 feet in its greatest breadth, and is to be chiefly of glass, with iron pillars secured in sockets, of which there will be 3,300. The quantity of glass required is about 900,000 superficial feet, weighing upwards of 400 tons. The exhibiting surface will be 21 acres, including the different galleries. The height of the center roof will be 64 feet, and the total cubic contents of the building 33,000,000 of feet. There will be 34 miles of gutters to carry off the water, and the length of sash bar will be 205 miles! The great light is to be tempered with canvas thrown over the roof, and a free ventilation is to be provided. The building will inclose several lofty trees. Curiosities will be brought there from the remotest parts of Asia as well as Europe and America, and the present preparations now making in the United States, will require probably more than one vessel to transport the articles. The show will continue for six months.

In addition to the proprietors and owners of these articles who may cross the ocean to see them, those who will go over for curiosity will no doubt be very numerous, and the advertisements now issued by ship owners to take passengers over and back for $100 each, will multiply the number vastly. A person, in this way, can make an excursion, and spend a week at the show, look at Ireland and France, and be in season for his passage back.

Institution for Imbeciles and Idiots, at Barre, Massachusetts.

The age of miracles is not past. Ours is emphatically such an age. The blind see, the lame walk, the deaf hear, and the dumb speak, in a somewhat different way, it is true, and by very different means, but not less really and truly, than when the desciple of John Baptist came to Jesus to obtain evidence whether he were the Christ. And now, as then, these miracles are wrought by Christian charity. They are the fruits and evidences of a religion, which has come down from heaven to earth, and is designed to restore man to the favor and image of God.

We had often been in Asylums for the deaf and dumb, for the blind and for the insane, and seen with delight how much can be done to ameliorate the condition, and even to educate the minds and hearts of these unfortunate classes. But it remained for a recent visit to the Institution which we have named at the head of this article, to show us the highest triumph of charity guided by wisdom. Nothing ever seemed so much like raising the dead, like breathing the breath of life into a human body, and animating it with a living soul. There were persons, who a year since only breathed and unconsciously digested the food which they scarcely knew how to swallow, who were incapable of walking or performing any voluntary motions, now climbing ladders, rolling at nine-pins, catching dumb bells, and going through various gymnastic exercises with a great degree of agility. Others came to the Institution, as almost all idiots are, as helpless in their personal habits, as regardless of personal decencies, as the veriest infant, and far more disgusting to the eye and every sense of the beholder; but they have been taught to dress decently, to maintain personal cleanliness, and to observe the proprieties of life to such a degree, that the teacher and proprietor of the establishment, who had witnessed all the transformation, could not but look on them and speak of them now, as "beautiful" children. Others again, not purely and strictly idiotic, but whom, from some cause or other, their parents and ordinary teachers had been unable to teach anything, have mastered the elements of geography and arithmetic, and were seen at their desks with their books in their hands and learning their lessons, like any other scholars of their age. It was delightful to behold the inexhaustible patience and the unwearied kindness with which Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur devoted themselves to the comfort and improvement of these poor creatures, not only teaching and training them by day, but watching over them by night, not as if impelled by necessity or mere duty, still less for filthy lucre's sake, but expressing and manifestly feeling toward them, in no small measure, the tenderness of parental love. And it was painfully interesting to see how the helpless innocents in return clung to their persons, hung on their lips, and watched their every movement with all an infant's feeling of affection and dependence. May they meet the reward from an enlightened public and a liberal commonwealth, which their self-denying labors so richly deserve.

The Institution at Barre is wholly a private enterprise. The children are chiefly, if not altogether, the children of parents in comfortable circumstances. It was instructive and affecting to hear what names they have, and to learn what families they represented.

There is but one other Institution of the kind in the United States. That is under the direction of Dr. Howe, and is connected with the Massachusetts Asylum for the Blind in Boston. Of course it is sustained by the State. It was opened a little more than a year since, with only ten or twelve pupils, and simply as an experiment. The result in Boston, as in Barre, has demonstrated the possibility, and therefore the duty, of greatly improving the condition of a class hitherto sunk in hopeless degradation and wretchedness. There is work enough for more than one or two such schools to educate the 1,400 or 1,500 idiots of this commonwealth, and the State Treasury should bo opened freely for the support of so noble a charity.

A Revolutionary Martron.

Perhaps no remark of Washington, says the Richmond Repulican, is more frequently quoted in Virginia then this :—

"Leave me but a banner to place upon the mountains, and I would rally around me the men who would lift our bleeding country from the dust and set her free."

The incident, continues the Republican, which led to this remark, is not, however, generally known. But it is one which does immortal honor to the women of Virginia, and lessens our wonder at the deeds of the heroes who sprung from their stock. It is thus related in How's Historical Collection:

"When the British force under Tarleton drove the Legislature from Charlotteville to Stanton, the stillness of the Sabbath eve was broken in the latter town by the beat of the drum, and volunteers were called to prevent the passage of the British through the Rockfish Gap. The elder sons of Mr. Lewis, who then resided at the old fort, were absent with the Northern army. Three sons, however, were at home, whose ages were 17, 15, and 13 years. Mr. Lewis was confined to his bed by sickness, but his wife, with the firmness of a Roman matron, called them to her, and bade them fly to the defense of their native land. 'Go, my children,' said she, 'I spare not my youngest, my fair-haired boy, the comfort of my declining years. I devote you all to my country. Keep back the foot of the invader from the soil of Angusta, or see my face no more.' It was the narration of this incident to Washington which caused the enthusiastic exclamation so often quoted."

Synopsis of the Bank Laws of New York.

The owner of Bank Stock is individually liable for the debts of the Bank, to an amount equal to the par value of the Stock. The fact that the Stock stands in the name of another person does not relieve from liability the real owner. Non-residents are equally liable with citizens of our own State. Any class of creditors can claim the benefit of this liability.

Safety Fund Banks can take 7 per cent. discount from all paper having over 63 days to run, but only 6 per cent. from shorter paper.

Free Banks can take 7 per cent. discount from all paper, without reference to time.

The circulating notes of the Safety Fund Banks are not required to be secured by a deposit with the Controller. The circulating notes of the Free Banks are secured as follows :—

1st. All New York State Stocks.

2d. Half N. Y. Stocks and half U. S. Stocks.

3d. Half N. Y. Stock and half Bonds and Mortgages.

4th. Half N. Y. Stock, and portions of U. S. Stocks and Bonds and Mortgages.

The Bonds and Mortgages must bear 7 per cent. interest, and must not exceed in amount two-fifths the value of the property, exclusive of buildings. The property must be unincumbered and productive.

The Stocks must bear 6 per cent., or an amount will be deducted which will leave in the Controller's hands a security equal to a Six per Cent. Stock.

Joint Stock Banks can organize on not less than $100,000 capital, and must deposit with the Controller not less than $100,000 of securities for circulating notes.

Individual Bankers are not required to have any given amount of capital, but must commence on not less than $50,000 of securities deposited for circulating notes.

All Banks and Bankers are required to provide for the redemption of their circulating notes, in New York City or Albany, at a half of one per cent. discount.

The Legislature cannot grant any special charters for banking purposes.

The Legislature cannot legalize a suspension of specie payments.

All circulating notes must be registered by the authority of the State, and ample security taken for their redemption in specie.

Holders of Bank Notes are preferred creditors. [Thompson's Reporter.

Republican Diplomacy.—Elihu Burritt makes some sensible remarks on the gimcrackery in which our ministers always rig themselves on every official occasion :—

"It does strike me as directly misrepresenting the dignity and duty of the great American Republic, when its representatives at foreign courts put themselves into cocked hats and mongrel military coats, and "tights" of bediddled plush, and hung with long awkward swords, which they would be ashamed to wear at home, and take upon them other airs and boyish gewgaws, in order to dance attendance on either royalty or aristocracy. I hope the people of the United States will look to this matter, and will demand that those whom they send abroad to represent their nation's dignity, shall comport themselves consistently with their high vocation, and don no livery before Kings or Queens, or the minor potentates or principalities of Europe, on any occasion. So strongly does the impropriety of this deportment take hold of my own mind, that, if I were President of the United States, I would send no minister to any foreign court which should require him at any time to appear in any other than that plain civilian dress which the constitution and customs of our country prescribe to him who receives the nation's guests at the White House in Washington.'

Anecdote of Jenny Jind.—We find the following characteristic anecdote of Jenny Lind, in the N. Y. Home Journal :—

"During her first visit here, a Swede called, and sent up a note in his native language, requesting to see her. She did not remember the name as she read it, but when the young man came in, she at once remembered his countenance—an old play-fellow when they were at school. She inquired his circumstances. He is a cabinet maker, residing with his wife and children at Brooklyn. The next day Jenny drove over and made the wife of her old school-fellow a long visit. Again, the next day, just before leaving the city for Boston, she went again. The husband was not at home. She gave the wife a note for him—he opened it on his return—it contained a sweetly worded request that he would allow her to give his children a memento of their father's school friendship with Jenny Lind. The 'memento' was a check for ten thousand dollars. This anecdote, we assure our readers, is correct in all its particulars. The fashionables say it is impossible to get a visit from Jenny Lind. It reminds us—with the above circumstance—of a proverb we have somewhere seen—'The rich draw friends to them—the poor draw Angels.'"

Artesian Wells.—The famous Artesian Well at Kissengen, in Bavaria, commenced eighteen years ago, and which it was feared would have to be abandoned as a failure, has just given the most satisfactory results. The town is located in a saline valley, nine hundred and eighty four feet above the level of the Baltic sea. Last June boring had reached a depth of eighteen hundred and thirty-seven feet, and several layers of salt, separated by a strata of granite, had been traversed, when carbonic acid gas, followed again by granite, was found. Finally, at a depth of two thousand and sixty-seven feet, perseverance was rewarded by complete success. A violent explosion burst away the scaffolding built to facilitate the operations, and a column of water four and a half inches in diameter spouted forth to the hight of ninety-eight feet above the surface. The water—clear as crystal—is of a temperature of sixty-six Fahrenheit, and is abundantly charged with salt. It is calculated that the annual product will be upwards of 6,000,000 lbs., increasing the royal revenues by 300,000 florins, after deducting all expenses.

Indian Batter Cakes.—Mix together a quart of sifted Indian meal, the (yellow meal is best for all purposes,) and a handful of wheat flour. Warm a quart of milk, and stir into it a small teaspoonful of salt, and two large tablespoonfuls of the best fresh yeast. Beat three eggs very light and stir them gradually into the milk in turn with the meal. Cover it, and set it to rise for three or four hours. When quite light, bake it on a griddle, in the manner of buckwheat cakes. Butter them, cut them across, and send them to table hot, with molasses in a sauce boat. If the batter should chance to become sour before it is baked, stir in about a salt-spoonful of pearlash, dissolved in a little lukewarm water, and let it stand half an hour longer before it is baked. [Miss Leslie.

The One Plank.—A Russian ship of war was overtaken by a violent storm on the coast of Kamtschatka, stranded and dashed to pieces upon a reef. A sailor attempted to reach the shore upon a fragment of the wreck. In a little while he perceived one of the officers, M. Minski, struggling with the waves and offered him a share of his plank. "No, my boy," he cried, "it is too light for two of us; God has given it to you; keep it, and go and tell my wife that I die with her upon my mind." The sailor urged; the officer again declined. This noble combat lasted an instant; when, seeing his superior determined to refuse this anchor of safety, the sailor pushed the plank with all his force towards him, and sank in the waves. The officer was preserved.

How to Preach.—A selebrated preacher, now deceased, in a charge which he delivered to a young minister at his ordination, thus addressed him: "Let me remind you, Sir, that when you come into this place, you are not to bring your little self with you. I repeat it again, Sir, that it may more deeply impress your momory; I say that you are never to bring your little self with you. No, Sir; when you stand in this sacred place, it is your duty to hold up your great Master to your people, in his character, in his offices, in his promises, and in his glory. This picture you are to hold up to the view of your hearers, while you are to stand behind it, and not let so much as your little finger be seen."

Variety.

Coleridge says that there are four classes of readers. The first is like the hour-glass; and their reading being on the sand, it runs in and runs out and leaves no vestige behind. A second is like the sponge, which imbibes everything, and returns it in the same state, only a little dirtier. A third is like a jelly-bag, allowing all that is pure to pass away, and retaining only the refuse and dregs. The fourth is like the slaves in the diamond mines of Golconda, who, casting aside all that is worthless, obtain only pure gems.

In a political, economical and ethical sensene, the most valuable part of the nation is that which earns a moderate income, by constant industry widely useful; whether farming, manufacturing, trading, artisanship, teaching, publishing, or personal labor in public functions. There generally you find more order, domestic morality, religious observations, regularity of labor and conduct, and that frugality which excludes various vices and miseries incident to wealth and poverty, without degenerating into avarice.

Printers are often imposed on by knaves who send them notices of the decease of persons who have not paid the debt of nature A case of this kind happened in Dublin, whereupon an Irish attorney, after severely cencuring the publisher for his carelessness suggested that, in order to avoid such un' happy mistakes, "no printer should publish a death, unless informed of the fact by the party deceased!"

An eminent French statistical writer once took his station near the staircase at a London ball, for the purpose of ascertaining the proportion of gentlemen who arranged their hair with their fingers before entering the room. He found them to average about twenty-nine out of thirty, those who had least or most hair usually occupying most time.

One of Cromwell's followers, who filled the important station of an Irish justice, at the period of 1661, having occasion to write the word "usage," contrived to spell it without using a single letter of the original word; his improved orthography was "youzitch." When some remarks were made on similar feats, he averred that "nobody could spell with pens made from Irish geese."

At Suffolk assizes, in the course of a trial for murder, Baron Alderson, addressing a lady on the bench, accompanied by a very intelligent-looking little boy about six or seven years of age, said, "Do you think you are acting a wise part in bringing a child of that age to hear details of this kind? I'm ashamed of you; take him out."

Among the newest inventions are swimming stockings, acting on the same principle as the webbed feet of aquatic birds. They were tested by one of the members of the British Association, who, with their aid, swam with ease from New-Haven to Leith Harbor, against tide.

Sir Isaac Newton, on going to his study one evening, and finding that his dog had overturned a lamp on the table and burned up some manuscript papers, containing the calculations of years, mildly remarked, "Ah! Diamond! Diamond! thou little knowest the mischief thou hast done."

An editor received a letter in which weather was spelled "wethur." He said it was the worst spell of weather he had ever seen.

The figures expressing the number of these United States have at last changed, the old "13" is turned around into 31.

In the Common Branches, classes will be formed at the commencement of each term; but in the higher, the interest of the student, as well as the welfare of the Institution, demand that a more systematic course of study be pursued.

In the Natural Sciences, Elementary Chemistry and Philosophy will be pursued during the Fall Term Agricultural Chemistry, Astronomy, and Physiology during the Winter Term; Botany and Geology during the Summer Term.

Classes will be formed in Latin, French, and German, at the commencement of the Fall Term; in Hebrew, Greek, and Spanish, at the commencement of the Winter Term, and continue through the course of study.

In Mathematics, Geometry is studied in the Fall, Trigonometry and Conic Sections in the Winter, and Astronomy, Surveying, Navigation, &c., in the Summer Term.

The course of instruction in Agriculture is thorougly scientific, embracing study and recitation in the best authors. Instruction is given in a well-furnished laboratory, in the analysis of soils, ashes of plants, manures, &c. and the modes of testing for their constituent elements. The attention of farmers who wish to give their sons a practical education is especially called to this department.

Board in private families, from $1 25 to $1 50. Many students board in clubs for 60 to 75 cents.

Tuition—to be settled upon entering school—from $3 00 to $5 00. Extras—For Drawing, $1 00; Oil Painting, $5 00; Chemical Experiments, $1 00; Writing, including stationery, 50 cents; Piano Forte, $8 00; Use of Instrument, $2 00; Agricultural Chemistry, including chemicals, apparatus, and fuel, (breakage extra,) $12 00.

It is very desirable that students should enter at the beginning of the term; yet they are received into classes already formed at any time.

A SPECIMEN OF GEO. THOMPSON'S ELOQUENCE.

The Chronotype publishes entire the speech which George Thompson, the British philanthropist and statesman, would have delivered in Faneuil Hall, Boston, on the evening of the 15th inst., if he had not been prevented by that disgraceful row of which we gave an account last week. It is a production worthy of the man and of the occasion. It commences with an expression of Mr. Thompson's warm and friendly interest in all that concerns the character, prosperity, and future greatness of this country. Then follows a lengthy review of the changes which have taken place, and the progress which has been made in Great Britain, during the fifteen years since Mr. T.'s former visit to this country—the abolition of Slavery and the Corn Laws, the rigorous investigation of the financial system of the country, the overhauling of the representative system, &c. We copy the concluding portion of the speech, for the double purpose of giving a specimen of Mr. Thompson's eloquence, and showing the character of the man to whom a Boston audience, in the "Cradle of Liberty refused to listen :—

I turn for a moment to the country I am permitted to visit, and I find that your course, like our own, has been onward.

Language fails to describe the progress you have made since I last stood on these shores. Here in this city I see all the evidences of increased population, augmented wealth, a growing commerce, an extending city, and a community in circumstances of comfort and prosperity that make me weep over the different lot of thousands in the cities and towns of my own land. I look into the Proclamation of your Governor, and I find that he calls upon you to thank God that "general health and plenty have prevailed in your Commonwealth; that in the workshops, and on 'change, amid the peaceful pursuits of agriculture, in the busy marts of trade, and among the robust and hardy adventurers of the sea, who bring up from the depths of distant oceans the materials for lighting up their countrymen upon the land, a success and prosperity have rewarded the enterprise of your varied industry and business, which evince an overruling Providence."

Citizens of Massachusetts! I congratulate you, from my heart, that such is your lot. I congratulate you still more, that, amid the signs of increasing material wealth and prosperity, there are also the infallible evidences of a no less remarkable progress in the moral feelings and the opinions of the people of this favored State. Need I go beyond these walls to find the proof that you have not stood still during the last fifteen years? Do I not furnish in my own history the unmistakable evidence, standing where I now do, that Massachusetts, has kept pace with the spirit of the age—that Massachusetts has not sworn that she will not be wiser to-morrow than she has been to-day—that Massachusetts has not forgotten the God that guided the Mayflower to Plymouth Rock—and that, though the peerless intellect of Massachusetts may suffer from the stroke of a Southern sun, the heart of the old Bay State is sound, and still beats responsive to the instincts of nature, the dictates of humanity, and the claims of the trembling outcast who asks a shelter on her soil.

If I cast my eyes over the vast extent of your country, from the rocky shores of Maine to the gold regions of California, I find the same indications of growth, expansion, prosperity and power; indications, also, of the gradual but sure diffusion of principles, tending in their spread and triumph to the removal of whatever is calculated to sully the fair fame, or to impair the usefulness of this nation. As a lover of human freedom, I cannot but rejoice that the last State admitted into the Union, is one which has by its own Constitution prohibited Slavery, and that at the last election in Massachusetts, a Free Soil candidate for Congress was triumphant.

Citizens of Massachusetts! I come among you as a friend. As far as I am permitted to call myself the representative of any portion of my countrymen, I represent those, who, equally with myself, rejoice in your prosperity and sympathize with you in all your efforts to perpetuate liberty among yourselves, and extend it throughout the world. If there be any in England who envy your greatness—any who lament over the success of your great experiment—any who would gladly see you halt in your glorious career—any who would, if they had the means, impede your progress—with such I have neither connection nor sympathy—I leave them to seek fellowship with the despots and reactionaries of Europe, and to the vigilant attention of Barclay & Perkins' draymen. Standing here as an individual man, I can declare, as concerning the destinies of nations, and after the success of the efforts of Reformers at home to obtain for the people their just rights, I desire nothing more earnestly than the stability and extension of the institutions of this country, as far as they are intended and designed to secure the liberty of the human race, without distinction of condition or color. As an Englishman, I thank God that so many of my countrymen have found a home and a country here. I lament the causes that have compelled too many of them to emigrate to these shores, but I rejoice that here they have found a welcome—honest employment—a homestead—the privilege of citizenship, and a home for their children. May they prove grateful for the benefits they have reaped on this soil, and may they render to God a suitable return by becoming the benefactors of all who, like themselves, have experienced the evils of misgovernment—may they never steel their hearts against the cry of the helpless, or take part with the oppressors of their fellow man.

If it be imputed to me that I have identified myself with those who are held in slavery on this soil, and have sought to promulgate the doctrines of emancipation, I acknowledge the justice of the impeachment, and plead guilty. My offense reaches far beyond the limits of the United States. My aspirations for freedom are as wide as the soil polluted by the footprints of a tyrant. In advocating the rights of humanity, I know of no geographical boundaries. I walk upon God's earth, among God's children, and wherever I see one of them smitten down, I will denounce the aggressor, and demand the deliverance of the captive.

If this be a crime, I am in good company. I am in company with a cndidate for the Presidential chair. I am in company with the Secretary of State for the United States of America.

These men may possibly make a distinction between an act committed on the banks of the Tyber and the Danube, and a similar act committed on the banks of the Potomac or the Mississippi. I can make no such distinction. They may make a distinction between Kossuth in Turkey and William Crafts in Massachusetts. I can make none. I read the language of Mr. Webster, and I admire it for the justice of the sentiments it breathes as well as for its lofty and thrilling eloquence, but he must not blame me if I apply it to other circumstances and events beside those which were under his notice at the time. He must not blame me, if standing in Faneuil Hall I say, in his own matchless words:

"I see that the South demands of Massachusetts that the noble Crafts and his equally noble companion should be given up, and I see that this demand is in derision of the established law of nations. Gentlemen, there is something on earth greater than arbitrary or despotic power. The lightning has its power, and the whirlwind has its power; but there is something among men more capable of shaking despotic power than lightning, whirlwind, or earthquake—that is the threatened indignation of the whole civilized world."

Thanks to Massachusetts, this indignation has not been invoked—on the contrary, the conduct of Massachusetts has been such as will light up with radiance the face of every man in every country who is the friend of humanity, and the consistent lover of impartial freedom. What need I say more than that I am proud to be on Massachusetts soil to-night, and will consent to be myself banished if I may leave this State as the inviolable asylum of the slave. Many representations have been made respecting the objects of my visit to this country.

I have seen none that are correct with the exception of those which have been put forth by my friends in this city. In England, we are in the habit of welcoming many of the citizens of this country to our shores, and it has been my good fortune to have it in my power, sometimes, to entertain at my humble board, the visitors who come among us. I trust that I may say we are not wanting either in individual or national hospitality. Some of those who thus honor us, come on missions of philanthropy and reform. They come to turn us from our evil ways, and to expose in the clearer light with which you are blessed, our national sins and deformities. They come to rebuke the spirit of war; they come to speak of temperance; they come to point our distressed and struggling population to this land of promise, where no tithe-collector and rack-renting landlords spoil the husbandman of the fruit of his industry. I think I may take upon me to say that they have not been ill-received. At least I may say this—that those with whom I am identified, have ever given such good men a warm welcome, and their best wishes for their success.

Well, after 15 years absence, I revisit these shores. I come to see those who cherished me when I was formerly here, who were neither ashamed nor afraid to own themselves my friends when there was a state of feeling far different from that which now exists. If I have any mission, it is one of my own desiring, for I consulted only my own inclinations and objects in coming. But if there be those who will have it that I come here with some special object, then let me say, that it is this, if it is any, to tell the citizens of these States that there are millions on the other side of the Atlantic, who glory in the success which has crowned the efforts of the People of this country to build up their Institutions, and who look to America to send out through all lands the gospel of political liberty; to tell them, too, that there is one sad drawback upon their influence in Europe, and that it is Slavery; that the enemies of freedom point to that fact with exultation—that they desire its continuance and its spread—that they would be glad to see it reinstated in Massachusetts, and made eternal, that they might forever point to it as a proof of the licentiousness of those who set up to govern themselves and abuse their own liberty by enslaving others. If I have a mission it is this, and if I have a message, this is my message.

Citizens of America! the ark of Liberty is with you, and the nations of the earth are flying to it. You are great, glorious, and free—but your slavery tarnishes your reputation, and fills the quiver of the enemies of freedom. Make haste, then, to purge your nation from the stain. Continue the good work that has begun among you. Consider no foreigner a friend of America who vindicates your slavery: consider no man your enemy, who desires its overthrow. Peacefully but firmly proclaim the great truths which went forth from the Cradle of Liberty, nor halt in your career of mercy until, from the Atlantic to the most northern limits of your territory, your soil should be sacred to freedom and humanity.

A FEW WORDS ON SUBSTITUTES FOR WAR.

The Peace Society have requested the friends of peace throughout the country to unite with them in petitioning Congress to take action in favor of measures for the peaceful adjustment of all national controversies; and I wish now to explain very briefly the expedients we recommend for the accomplishment of this object.

We aim at a direct application of the gospel to the intercourse of nations, and insist that its pacific principles must, when rightly applied, put an end to their wars and their whole war-system. It cannot indeed prevent the rise of occasional misunderstandings between them, for these will ever be incident to the best condition of humanity even in the millenium; but it will teach them better means of adjusting their difficulties than the wholesale butcheries and the wild, reckless atrocities of war. The sword has hitherto been the recognized arbiter of their disputes; but, in place of this blind and brutal arbitrament, we propose to introduce Christian modes of settling all their controversies, and thus obviate every plea of necessity for either actual war between them, or the continuance of their present enormously expensive war-system.

Our scheme rests on a very simple but very comprehensive idea. Nations in their intercourse are confessedly under the same general obligations as individuals; and hence we merely ask the former to settle their disputes as the latter do theirs. We would fain extend to nations essentially the same principles and methods of mutual justice that every civilized, Christian community has provided for its individual members. Now, a dispute between the latter can be settled in only one of two ways—by amicable agreement between the parties, or by reference to a third party as umpire; they must either decide the controversy themselves, or let somebody else decide it for them. If unable satisfactorily to adjust it between themselves, they may either submit it to umpires of their own choice, or carry it into a court where they find a set of common referees, appointed by society, and acting under the guidance of common laws, ready to decide all such controversies. Every such trial in a court of justice is only another form of reference; and the chief difference here is, that society, instead of the immediate parties, selects the referees, not for a particular case, but for all cases alike. The principle is the same; but the judge and jury are a standing board of reference for all litigants. When two individuals, or two minor communities, such as towns or cities, counties or even states, get into a dispute which they cannot or will not settle themselves, nor refer to umpires specially chosen by them for the purpose, we have first a common code of laws to define their respective rights and obligations in the case, and next a common board of referees, in the person of judge and jury, to apply that code for an equitable adjustment of the controversy.

Here is the substance of what we wish to provide for nations—a system of legal, peaceful justice analogous to what we already have both for individuals, and all minor communities. We propose no new principle, but one as old as government itself, or civilized society. This simple, long-established principle we would extend to nations, and have them settle their disputes as individuals among us do theirs. In this matter even nations professedly Christian have for ages treated each other very like brutes or barbarians; and now we just urge them to discard a practice, the relic in fact of a pagan barbarism, utterly unworthy of their character in this noon of the nineteenth century, and adopt in its place rational, peaceful, Christian methods of mutual justice, security, and peace.

The most prominent of these methods are three. The first in order, NEGOTIATION, or amicable agreement between the parties themselves; a method already in occasional and growing use, and for which no legislative action is needed; but if nations cannot, or will not, adjust their own difficulties, they must of necessity resort to some form of reference. Our next substitute, then, would be STIPULATED ARBITRATION, by which we mean that nations incorporate in their treaties a clause binding themselves in the last resort to settle whatever disputes may arise between them, not by the sword in any case, but by umpires mutually chosen, and either to abide by their decision, or ask merely a new hearing, or a different reference. But the ultimatum of all our plans would be a CONGRESS OF NATIONS, or a permanent system of justice between nations analagous to what every civilized community has provided for individuals in its codes and courts of law. We cannot here go into any details of this last and most perfect substitute for war, but will just add, that we hope, first, for an authoritative Code of International Law, not a mere treatise like that which is now called the law of nations, and has influence mainly by custom or courtesy, but a system of laws duly enacted, like those of a single state, by the parties to it; and, next, a High Court of Nations, to interpret and apply these laws for the peaceful adjustment of whatever disputes may be referred to them by nations in controversy.

It would be very easy to bring forward a long array of arguments in favor of such substitutes for war; but, leaving this point to the reader's good sense, we deem it more important to inquire how we can induce nations to adopt these substitutes as their permanent policy. It is obvious enough that such a consummation cannot be reached at once, but must come as the result of efforts long continued for the purpose, and producing a general change of views, feelings, and habits on this subject throughout the great commonwealth of nations. They must be educated to the system of peace, as they have been to that of war. Any settled policy whatever, of nations must be the growth of time, of concurrent influences, of assimilated views, of intermingled and indissoluble interests all conspiring to uphold and perpetuate that policy. The effective laws of every people are a transcript of their general character, an expression of their common sentiments and wishes. It is idle to legislate much, if at all, in advance of public opinion as an index to the general will; and hence we can hope for such a change as we propose in the international policy of Christendom, only in response to a wide and urgent demand from the people.

Here is a clue to our whole course of efforts in the cause of peace. Our only hope, under God, lies in Christianizing the popular mind on this subject by a right application of the gospel to the case; and hence we wish, through the all-pervading agency of the school and the fireside, the press, the pulpit, and the platform, to produce such a change in public opinion as shall effectually forbid, hereafter, a resort to the sword in any controversy between the nations of Christendom, and induce them to adopt such peaceful substitutes as shall supersede forever the alledged necessity of war and the war-system.

Such is our work; and, as one means of hastening its accomplishment, we would solicit the friends of peace, without distinction of sect or party, to unite throughout the country in petitioning Congress to take such measures as may be deemed most expedient to secure rational, peaceful substitutes for war. Our rulers will, of course, move on this subject in earnest only in answer to the wishes of the people; but, whenever they shall join in a general, earnest, persevering demand for some means other than the sword for the settlement of national disputes, we may then expect Congress and the Executive to take decisive measures in favor of the object.

EPITAPH OF AILEEN ARTARE.

Here, in a little cave,
The prettiest nook of this most grassy vale,
All amid lilies pale,
That turn
Their heads into my little vault, and mourn,
Stranger, I've made my grave.

I am not all forgot;
A small hoarse stream murmurs close by my pillow,
And o'er me a green willow
Doth weep,
Still questioning the air, "Why doth she sleep,—
The girl, in this cold spot?"

Even the very winds
Come to my cave and sigh; they often bring
Rose-leaves upon their wing,
To strew
Over my grave, and leaves of violets blue;
In sooth, leaves of all kinds.

Fresh is my mossy bed;
The frequent pity of the rock falls here—
A clear, cold, silent tear:
I've heard,
Sometimes, a wild and melancholy bird,
Warbles at my grave-head.

Read this small tablet e'er,
That holds mine epitaph upon its cheek of pearl:—
"Here lies a simple girl,
Who died,
Like a pale flow'r nipt in its sweet spring-tide,
Ere it had bloomed." No more.

From the Episcopal Recorder.

THE BEREAVED MOTHER.

We take the following extract from a letter sent us by a lady who resides in a southern city:—

"I have recently been bereaved of a lovely child, a little girl, not quite five years old. Her intellectual powers were far above her years; she seemed like a continual sunbeam about my path, to cheer me on; but she is gone, and I am left to bear a burden which I find almost insupportable. I have not yet been able to say, 'Thy will be done,' and find it so difficult to recognize, in this dispensation, the hand of a wise and gracious Providence, that I am induced to beg the favor of your views in reference to such a bereavement."

The following, from a correspondent, may suggest to this afflicted mother thoughts for reflection:—

"A beautiful child, one morning, offered some rich dainty to a sky-lark in a golden cage; but the bird refused to eat, and flapped his wings against his prison bars, eager to soar through accustomed fields of light, and sing at 'heaven's gate.'

"Then the child knew that his favorite cared for other food, and longed to fly from his narrow home; so he opened the door of his pretty cage, and soon the lark was soaring on swift wings, singing a song of richest melody, and was hidden by a snowy cloud from the little gazer.

"After a few brief days, the spirit of the child, like the bird, escaped from its earthly prison; the door being opened by the Angel of Death.

"The Lord saw that that moral tenement, beautiful though it was, formed no fit mansion to contain a spirit ready to join the cherub choir of infant worshipers in heaven. A way of escape was afforded, and the ransomed child responded to the call of a Saviour, 'Suffer the little ones to come unto me, and forbid them not, for of such is the kingdom of heaven.' M. B. C."

Perhaps the following, which we take from a cotemporary, may minister comfort:

"In a village grave-yard, on a chaste and beautiful tombstone, I read an inscription that has dwelt in my mind since reading it, as peculiarly striking and appropriate. The record of virtues bright and lovely was first made, and then followed these words:

"'THAT WHICH THOU SOWEST IS NOT QUICKENED EXCEPT IT DIE.'

"It was a precious, precious thought, and I bent my head upon the marble and studied the blessed truth. It was pure revelation; reason would have never reached it, yet I believed it with all my heart, and saw that immortality is only through the tomb.

"Except it die! I have sown some seed in the ground. The lamb of my affections has been laid in the tomb. He was sown in corruption, but he will be raised again. His dust will be quickened, and, like the grain that has been sown, he will start into life and beauty, and bloom in the paradise of God forever. In this thought there is comfort most comforting; nay, it excites me, and stirs me, and half persuades me that it was better far to bury the seed than keep it. It will yield a harvest of joy hereafter.

"This tombstone has spoken to my soul. It has given me hope and strength in the midst of weakness and grief. Reader, bereaved reader, that which thou sowest is not quickened except it die."

A COLORED PREACHER.

Jack is a Methodist local preacher. In one of his sermons he told this story: "When I was a lad, there were no religious people where I lived. But I had a young master about my age who was going to school, and he was very fond of me. At night he would come into the kitchen to teach me the lesson he had learned himself during the day at school. In this way I learned to read.

"When I was well-nigh grown up," said Jack, "we took up the New Testament, and agreed to read it verse by verse. When one would make a mistake, the other was to correct him, so that we would learn to read well.

"In a short time, we both felt that we were sinners before God, and we both agreed to seek the the salvation of our souls. The Lord heard our prayers, and gave us both a hope in Christ. Then I began to hold meetings for prayer and exhortation among the colored people.

"My old master soon found out what was going on. He was very angry, especially because his son had become pious. He forbade my holding any more meetings, saying, that if I did he would whip me severely for it.

"From that time I continued to preach or exhort on Sabbath nights; and on Monday mornings my old master would tie me up, and cut my back to pieces with a cow-hide, so that it had never time to get well. I was obliged to do my work in a great deal of pain from day to day.

"Thus I lived near a year and a half. One morning my master, as usual, had made my fellow-slaves tie me to a shady tree in the yard, after stripping my back naked to receive the cow-hide. It was a beautiful morning in the summer time, and the sun shone very bright. Every thing around looked very pleasant. He came up to me with cool deliberation, took his stand, and looked at me closely, but the cow-hide hung still by his side. His conscience was at work, and it was a great moment in his life.

"'Well, Jack,' said he, 'your back is covered all over with scars and sores, and I see no place to begin to whip. You obstinate wretch, how long do you intend to go on in this way?'

"'Why, master, just as long as the Lord will let me live,' was my reply.

"'Well, what is your design in it?'

"'Why, master, in the morning of the resurrection, my poor body shall rise from the grave, and I intend to show these scars to my heavenly Father, as so many witnesses of my faithfulness in his cause.' He ordered them to untie me, and sent me to hoe corn in the field. Late in the evening he came along, pulling a weed here and a weed there, till he got to me, and then told me to sit down.

"'Jack,' said he, 'I want you to tell me the truth. You know that for a long time your back has been sore from the cow-hide; you have had to work very hard, and are a poor slave. Now, tell me, are you happy or not, under such troubles as these?'

"'Yes, master, I believe I am as happy a man as there is on earth?'

"'Well, Jack,' said he, 'I am not happy. Religion, you say, teaches you to pray for those that injure you. Now, will you pray for your old master, Jack?'

"Yes, with all my heart,' said I.

"We kneeled down, and I prayed for him. He came again and again to me. I prayed for him in the field, till he found peace in the blood of the Lamb. After this, we lived together like brothers, in the same church. On his death-bed he gave me my liberty, and told me to go a preaching as long as I lived, and meet him at last in heaven.

"I have seen," said Jack, "many Christians whom I loved, but I have never seen any I loved so well as my old master. I hope I shall meet him again in heaven."

HAVE A PLACE FOR PRAYER.

We do not need to enter the closet to find the Lord. He is ever near to us. But we enter in order to escape distractions, and in order to regain those associations, and, it may be, to surround ourselves with those mementos, which we formerly found helped to our prayers. One who has great powers of abstraction may take refuge from surrounding bustle in the depths of his own spirit, and pass along the crowded streets in the perpetual hermitage of his own self-seclusion, undiverted and undistracted by all that is whirling round him. But few have this talent of inward sequestration—this power to make a closet of themselves; and, in order to find for their thoughts a peaceful sanctuary, they must find for their persons a tranquil asylum. It little matters where or what it is. Isaac went out into the field, and Jacob plied his night-long prayer beside the running brook. Abraham planted a grove, and, in the cool shadow of his oaks, at Beersheba, he called on the name of the Lord. Abraham's servant knelt down beside his camel; and it would appear, from some of his psalms, that a cave, a mountain fastness, or cavern in the rocks, was David's frequent oratory. Peter had chosen for his place of prayer the quiet and airy roof of his seaside lodging, when the messenger of Cornelius found him. It would seem, that the open air—the noiseless amplitude of the "solitary place"—the hill-side, with the stars above, and the shadowy world below—the fragrant stillness of the garden when evening had dismissed the laborers, were where the man of sorrows loved to pray.

It was in the old church of Ayr that John Welsh was wont, all alone, to wrestle with the angel of the covenant; and we have stood in the wild rock-cleft where Peden found frequent refuge from his persecutors, and whence he caused his cry to ascend "unto the Lord most high." It does not need four walls and a bolted door to make a place of prayer. Retirement and silence, and a sequestered spirit will create it any where. By the shore of the sounding sea—in the depths of the forest—in the remoteness of the green garden bower—nay, amidst the dust of the dingy ware-room, or the cobwebs of the owlet haunted barn, in the jolting corner of the crowded stage, or the unnoticed nook of the travelers' room, you have only to shut your eyes, and seclude your spirit, and you have created a closet there. It is a closet wherever the soul finds itself alone with God.

REV. JOTHAM SEWALL.

A week or two since, we announced the death of this venerable servant of Christ. He was ninety years old last January, having been born January 1, 1760. Our acquaintance with him was of thirty-five years' standing. We first met him at the house of a mutual friend in this city. He has preached in 16 States, and labored fifty years as a missionary. If our recollection is correct, he once informed us that he had gathered forty churches in Maine. He spent his time in the new settlements, in visiting from house to house and collecting the people together in school-houses, and talking to them in the most familiar manner.

On our first introduction to Mr. S., his first salutation was, "Well, my young friend, have you got tired of preaching?" We were rather surprised at this abrupt question, and after a short pause, replied, "We have not been long in the ministry, but have had some things to discourage us; but as you have been longer in the field than we have, we will take liberty to ask you the same question." "Tired, yes," replied father S., "an hundred times; I have frequently thought of what my old master said when I first began to preach on the Kennebec. I was brought up a mason, and my old master, when I first began to preach, went to hear me, and said, 'Sewall is a clever fellow, but a thousand pities that he ever left the trowel.' I have often thought of that saying, 'a thousand pities that Sewall ever left the trowel.'" At that interview, he also related another incident of his life.

"The first time that I preached in a large place was at Newburyport, for the late Dr. Spring. In the morning I preached with some embarrassment; but before the evening service I retired to the Dr.'s study, and prayed for Divine assistance, obtained some liberty in prayer, and was enabled to preach with plainness. Dr. Spring informed me aftewards, that his son Gardner went home that night weeping; and this sermon resulted in his conversion."

Our last interview with this venerable man was at our office about three months before his death. He was evidently failing. He said that his friends sold his horse and wagon last Fall, and that they would not trust him to go about alone.

Few men have accomplished more good in their day and generation, than Rev. Jotham Sewall. Few men will have more stars in their crown of rejoicing in the day of the Lord Jesus. [Boston Recorder.

THE SLOTHFUL SERVANT'S EXCUSE.

"IT'S OTHER PEOPLE'S BUSINESS AS MUCH AS MINE."

This may be a reason why other people should perform it as well as you, but it can be no reason why you should neglect it as well as other people. The unfaithfulness of others does not excuse, but it aggravates your neglect. It was as much the business of the other disciples as of Peter to remain faithful to their master in the time of his extremity. But they all forsook him and fled. Did their desertion of their Lord excuse Peter's act of denying him? Did it not rather make his guilt the more heinous. When the multitude prove false, then, if we love our Saviour, is the time for us to manifest our love by adhering steadfastly to his service. Faithfulness in the midst of unfaithfulness has ever been, with good reason, esteemed peculiarly excellent and glorious. How bright did the loyalty of Abdiel shine as he passed forth from among the serried ranks of rebel angels, the only one of all that innumerable host who remained true to his Maker!

——"faithful found
Among the faithless, faithful only he,
Among innumerable false, unmoved,
Unshaken, unseduced, unterrified,
His loyalty he kept, his love, his zeal;
Nor number nor example with him wrought
To swerve from truth, or change his constant mind, Though single."

But let us take another view of this excuse. Can anything be more absurd than to urge the fact that here are few to perform a common duty as a reason why you should stand aloof from it? Were others ready and prompt, your labor might perhaps be dispensed with, at least the want of it would be less missed. But now their neglect is the very thing which makes your service the more indispensable. Your obligation then to fidelity is increased, not diminished, by the unfaithfulness of others.

A pious Scotch minister, being asked by a friend during a late illness, whether he thought himself dying, answered, "Really, friend, I care not whether I am or not; for if I die, I shall be with God; and if I live, he will be with me."

As the shadow follows the body in the splendor of the rarest sunlight, so will the wrong done to another, pursue the soul in the hours of prosperity.

JEWISH FESTIVALS.

We think that some misapprehension exists among Christians generally with regard to the disposition which the New Dispensation has made of Jewish Festivals. For the most part, it is supposed, that the death of Christ swept them away so completely, that any one who should now undertake to observe them, be he Jew or Gentile, would be considered as renouncing salvation by Jesus of Nazareth. We look upon the matter somewhat differently. We do not see why a Jew, who has embraced Jesus of Nazareth as the Messiah, should be held under obligation to cease celebrating the Passover and some of the other festivals of the Old Testament. We are aware, that this declaration will appear somewhat startling to those who consider themselves too clear-sighted to be mistaken; but we hope that they will consider what we have to say before they utterly condemn us.

The Jewish festivals were not all of a strictly typical character. Some of them were commemorative as well as typical. For example, the Passover was intended to commemorate a very noted fact in the history of the Hebrew nation. When the children of the Hebrews asked them, "What mean ye by this service?" the answer was, "It is the sacrifice of the Lord's Passover, who passed over the houses of the children of Israel in Egypt, when he smote the Egyptians, and delivered our houses." That it was also intended to typify the deliverance effected by the blood of Christ for the Church, there can be no question. (See 1 Cor. 5: 7.)

The feast of Pentecost was another festival of a commemorative character. It was celebrated fifty days after the Passover, and was intended to commemorate the promulgation of the Law from Mount Sinai.

The feast of Tabernacles was another. The design was to commemorate the fact, that God made the children of Israel to dwell in booths, when he brought them out of the land of Egypt. Lev. 23: 43.

We need not specify any more. What we wish to say is this: That while it would be altogether wrong to continue the observance of these festivals as types of a Redeemer, (for that would be a practical denial that Christ had come in the flesh,) it can neither be wrong, nor anti-evangelical, for a Jew to observe them as so many memorials of important facts. The deliverance of Israel from Egyptian tyranny was an event in which the great goodness of God to that nation was manifested. Should not an Israelite ever remember it with gratitude? Is there not as much reason for him to remember it, and to mark its annual return by some significant observance, as there is for an American to commemorate our country's deliverance from the yoke of Britain? Why should such commemoration be considered as opposed to the spirit of the gospel?

We do not suppose that a Gentile ought to celebrate these festivals. It is the Jew only who has a national interest in them. It was for Israel as a nation, that deliverance was wrought from the Egyptian yoke. They were the Israelites only who were made to dwell in booths on their emancipation from bondage. It was to the Israelites as a nation, that the law was given in custody. The Gentile can, therefore, have no more interest in commemorating these facts, than a foreigner could have in keeping the Fourth of July. But we see no reason why a Jew, upon his conversion to Christianity, must straightway renounce all connection with his nation, and cease to commemorate with gratitude the great facts which were such signal occasions of the display of divine goodness and power. Did not God himself say, in regard to the Passover, "This day shall be unto you for a memorial; ye shall keep it a feast to the Lord throughout your generations; ye shall keep it a feast by an ordinance forever?" Ex. 12: 14. Surely, the believing Israelite can keep it as a memorial without keeping it as a type.

The great Apostle of the Gentiles appears to have continued the observance of the festivals after his conversion to Christianity. (See Acts 18: 21, and 20: 16; also 20: 24, and other places.) In his epistles he teaches that the Gentiles are exempt from all obligation to them; but does he teach any such doctrine with regard to the believing Jew?

In short, the true doctrine concerning festivals is, that they are to be observed by all those who have an interest in the facts which they commemorate. Thus we reason with regard to the Sabbath. It commemorates a fact in which the whole race of mankind have an interest, namely, God's rest at the close of his creative operations. Every man who can say, "I was created by Jehovah," has an interest in this fact; and his subsequent conversion to the faith of the gospel does not lessen that interest. He is, therefore, bound to observe the Sabbatic Rest. We reason in a similar manner concerning the ordinances of the gospel. In the facts which the Lord's Supper and Baptism commemorate, all Christians have an interest. Of course, they are expected to observe these institutions; while unbelievers, having no saving interest in the facts commemorated, are not expected to observe them.

COL. RICHARD M. JOHNSON died at Frankfort, Ky., Nov 18, at the age of about seventy years. His exploits in the war of 1813, especially his killing of Tecumseh in the battle of the Thames, did much to give him distinction. He was a member of the House of Representatives of the United States from 1807 to 1819, when he was transferred to the Senate. He served in the Senate till 1829, and then went back into the House, where he remained until called to the Vice Presidency in 1837. In 1829, the Sunday Mail agitation being brought before the House, he, as Chairman of the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, presented a report against the suspension of the Mails on Sunday, the ability of which was such as to put the subject at rest. Whether the Report was written by Col. Johnson, is a question in dispute.

BRITISH CORRESPONDENCE—No. 20.

GLASGOW. November 8th, 1850.

The hopes which the friends of Sunday observance in this country had begun to cherish, are not being realized. When Government complied with their demand that the Post-Office should be shut—although there was little difficulty in perceiving that this was done in no friendly spirit—the expectation was avowed by many, that measures would be adopted by the country generally for the universal sanctification of the first day of the week. Protestants who can find no Scripture for their practice in regard to the Sabbath, and who have no such power over either the friends or the enemies of the Bible in this country as the Pope has in Romish lands, would like well to get their Protestant Popery legalized by an act of Parliament. Failing in that, they have tried their influence with the Boards of Direction of the Railway, and are not pleased with their success. Both the London and Brighton and the Great Western continue even their Sunday Excursion Trains. Memorials in opposition to this recently introduced practice, (including one from the Bishop of Gloucester and Bristol, with the clergy of his diocese,) having been presented to the Directors of the Great Western, the latter have answered by letter, defending these trains, and expressing "regret that it is not consistent with their sense of duty" to put a stop to them. While they speak of the need of "relaxation on that day by persons incessantly employed in shops and factories" throughout the week, they yet say that the "Sunday Excursion Trains" tend to "promote a better observance" of Sunday.

Again, at the Half-Yearly Meeting of the Aberdeen Railway Company, held on the 24th ult., a motion that no traveling be permitted on the line on Sunday, was met by an amendment that "passengers be conveyed by the mail trains as usual." This amendment was carried by a large majority; and, on the notice being given that at the next meeting a similar motion against Sunday trains would be made, Mr. Reddish gave notice that he would then move that the Company run Sunday Excursion Trains for the accommodation of the public. And it seems to me quite as probable, that the amendment will be carried, as that the motion will. In no one instance in which, as usual, the motion for the suppression of Sunday trains has been made, at the recent meetings of Railway Companies, has that motion been carried, while in other cases, the determination to maintain them has been more unequivocally expressed. Most unquestionably, the spirit in this country is progressing towards the rejection of the church-made Sunday-Sabbath, without the indication yet, however, of a desire to return to the day which the Lord has sanctified and blessed. No day sequestered from pleasure or profit, is the avowed purpose of the great proportion of those taking public part in the discussions on the subject. With the design of promoting this spirit, a lengthened and elaborate article has appeared in the last number of the Westminster. It boldly maintains all days to be alike; and, to this end, turns to account the fact that the New Testament does not exalt the first day to the place which the seventh formerly held. If the friends of religion see no other injury in their trampling under foot the commandment of the Lord, they can scarcely fail to be made aware that their false assumptions on the subject are furnishing missiles with which the infidel assails all truth.

We look again to the Continent of Europe, and note the nature of Sunday observance there. A stupendous bronze statue, personifying Bavaria, and which has taken ten years to execute—being 54 feet high, and placed on a pedestal of granite 30 feet in height, with a majestic lion by her side—has been set up in the Theresa meadow near Munich. "The figure of this colossal Virgin of the whole German world," as it has in no right spirit been called, was, for the first time since its completion, unveiled on Sunday, Oct. 5th, in the presence of an immense concourse. The first Sunday in October, independently, is annually devoted to festive purposes, being one of three days termed the People's Festival, when the King distributes prizes to the peasants for horses, cattle, agricultural produce, shooting with the bow, and athletic games. But the inauguration of the statue had this year attracted large numbers from a great distance; and, on the Sunday, an immense procession, in carriages and on foot, with banners and music, reached the spot, where a troop of singers performed an "overture composed expressly for the occasion." The immense mass of wood necessary in the erection, which formed a "screen, fell with a huge sound, which," says the correspondent of the London Athenæum, "the roar of the cannon repeated, and the shout of the multitude prolonged." Bands of singers then "broke forth into one mighty song of triumph," and "after the song came an oration;" and this Sunday ceremony was concluded by "three cheers for King Ludwig"—king and subjects equally pleased to inaugurate thus the workmanship of man's hands, rather than remember Heaven's memorial of a world made by Him, and stored with wonders infinite.

The Pope's audacity continues to excite a large amount of public feeling. He has quite miscalculated the state of British feeling. We love a little Popery, and have chosen to retain a Popish-made Sabbath; we can bear a great deal of Popery, and suffered Tractarians to lead to Rome those for whose spiritual well-being they were called to care; but so large a dose of Popery as the old man has sent us, we protest we are unable to digest or accept. The clergy of England and of Scotland are loud in their outcry. Those of the Metropolis addressed their Bishop, (the true Bishop, I mean, in the Church of England's sense of that word,) and the Bishop, who bore so meekly Tractarian Popery, and flattered the Abbess of a Protestant nunnery, replies to their memorial, full of indignation. Even the Prime Minister of England, in a letter which he has just addressed to the Bishop of Durham, speaks of "the late aggression of the Pope upon our Protestantism" in terms which indicate that the insult will hardly be endured. "The present state of the law," he says, "shall be carefully examined," with a view to discover what can be done to send the red caps and red stockings across the sea again.

GLIMPSES OF DOMESTIC LIFE IN CHINA—NO. 7.

SHANGHAI, May 4, 1850.

I did not intend that my next letter on the subject of "Domestic Life in China," should be filled up with items of the same gloomy character that have occupied several of my last sheets; but the existing circumstances seem almost to force these upon me; and as there are some interesting customs yet to be mentioned, they seem to demand a place in this connection; that is to say, at the very time when they are thickening and crowding themselves upon our notice.

It is a common remark, that "misfortunes never come single;" and the same might be said of events and facts, as well as ideas, which, very far from being misfortunes, are, nevertheless, like birds of a feather, declared socialists. Have you never wondered how some leading idea in your own mind seems, simultaneously, to have found an equally prominent place in the mind of every body else? For instance, you find your own thoughts occupied with speculations about the catacombs of Paris, petrified proofs of successive antedeluvian ages, or inquiries into the probable fact that the witch of Endor did really bring up the prophet from his grave; and while you are wondering at their unbidden intrusion, you find all your brother editors conning the same subjects, and every newspaper you take up bears witness to the general mania for the researches of travelers among the subterranean tombs of France, the theories of geologists concerning some newly-discovered petrifactions, or the dissertation of learned divines upon the fact that Saul was bowed to the earth, with his mantle wrapped about his face, when the vision occurred, and could not therefore have seen Samuel had he actually been before him, so that the crafty woman might easily be mouth as well as eyes in the wonderful prediction which, like many another prophecy, may have been the cause of its own fulfillment.

Now, our mournful theme is death, and well does the king of terrors acquit himself in establishing the doctrine of coincidences all over this death-doomed earth. The great men and the mighty, the chief captains and the nobles, are every where falling. America mourns her ex-president, England her ex-queen, and China her ex-empress; and the news of the decease of the two queen dowagers, which reached Canton simultaneously, or on the same day, was soon followed by the tidings, that the Emperor Tankwang himself, had yielded to that dart which seeks so greedily the shining mark. But the insatiate destroyer, not content with all these trophies, again thrusts in his sickle, and rich men and poor, bond and free, are gathered alike to the great harvest of death.

Death—most gloomy of topics, most uninviting of themes—is that which, most of all, we seem bound to contemplate. And now, while he returns triumphant from his conquests, all the honors which await his footsteps, all the ceremonies of his august court, will unbidden force themselves upon our notice. We whose honored sojourn is in the Celestial Empire, are surfeited with the superabundance of such insignia as the grim monarch may look for in vain among all the terrestrial provinces of this his usurped domain. You seek to honor him with those sombre badges which typify the dark realms his victims inhabit. We "see him on his winding way," escorted every where by paler hues, or by the national symbol, ashy white. You would shave the head, or mar the corners of the beard, if, contrary to all scripture injunction, you were disposed to make any cuttings for the dead; but we are constantly greeted with the truly mournful display of unshaven heads, hitherto so bald and shining, now groaning beneath thick masses of "seedy black," or half concealed by the gloomy skull-cap, so affectingly destitute of its appropriate ornaments, the tassel of crimson silk at its apex, surmounted by the towering gilt button, and its crimson hoop. We cannot but long for the time when the days of this mourning shall be ended, that cheerful colors may once more gladden the human landscape, now so sterile or grey, as if every thing had fallen into the sere and faded hues of autumn. One might almost fancy, that the kind-hearted natives, in their zeal to carry out the custom of placing all useful or endeared articles in the coffin with their dead, had in this instance done it at the expense of the living. I have told you before, that every thing adapted to the exigencies of a long journey was always supplied to the departed one; and if he have been so unfortunate during his life time as to part with a tooth or a limb, these are also carefully preserved, and deposited in his coffin, that he may not enter halt or maimed the land of his future sojourn. His shoes, his fan, his pipe, or whatever in his living excursions he would have required, all are furnished him. "And what would you, upon this principle, place within my coffin, if I were gone?" I inquired of a Chinese lady who was explaining this custom to me. "I would not forget to give you your reticule," she said, taking it from my arm; "you could not do without this."

But I commenced this letter for the express purpose of mentioning to you a curious custom which we have just now, for the first time, witnessed. A woman came in, holding in her hands a bundle of burning incense sticks, which she continued to wave as she passed about from room to room, muttering some mysterious words, more like the magic tones of an incantation than the usual terms made use of at the shrines. But she declined all explanation of her conduct, merely replying to the repeated queries about her performances, "I am doing good deeds." These being finished, she left the house. On inquiry, we obtained the following explanation of the affair. This superstition, by the way, has no reference to us as foreigners, the natives always observing the same among themselves on similar occasions A neighbor had visited us, bringing a little child with her, which, upon returning home, was taken suddenly ill. The fact that it sickened directly after leaving here, rendered it highly probable that its spirit had been left at our house, and to prevent the liability of its being left in the wrong place in case of death, a friend had been deputed to burn incense to the demon who retained it, and induce him to restore it to its rightful home, that the dreaded calamity might be thus averted. The words of her incantations were these, "Quei, ken che; quei, ken che," (spirit, return; spirit, return.) I am sure I hope it did return, that it may not be added to the list of ghosts which are already supposed to infest our dwelling, and to whose reputed inhabitiveness we have been for the last three years indebted for the privileges of this our endeared home. No native would incur the danger of a residence in a haunted house, and the wonder is that we are not annoyed by the "quei," destitute too, as we are known to be, of the protection afforded by the notable door-gods of the natives. We have, however, another class of "housekeepers," as they are called by the Chinese, which are said to inhabit every dwelling, and are considered not only harmless, but quite indispensable to domestic prosperity, namely, serpents. They are supposed to keep themselves invisible until such times as they are about to die, in other words, transmigrate to a higher state of being, when they voluntarily come out from their lurking places, showing themselves to the inhabitants, and, as it were, inviting the blow which exalts them to a nobler life. To dispatch them is, therefore, a kindness, and it has already been our happiness to bring the wished-for relief to more than one of these our kind protectors, and we have satisfactory proof that more than one is left to guard our household treasures still.

THE AMERICAN BIBLE UNION.

This Society courts the coöperation of slaveholders. Their First Annual Report contains twenty-seven letters, from several of the Southern States—some from Baptist ministers, some from lay members, and one from a convention of Baptist churches in Kentucky. Like the American and Foreign Bible Society, it receives the avails of slavery into its treasury, which every anti-slavery man must consider as the price of blood. As calls are now being made by this Society upon Seventh-day Baptists for their active and liberal coöperation, the writer would suggest to the denomination the propriety of withholding their coöperation until they have fully satisfied themselves that such is or is not the case. From facts known to the American Baptist Free Mission Society, their consciences will not allow them to work with this or any Society who allow themselves to be drawn into and who seek a copartnership with slaveholders in the great work of missions and of giving the Bible to the world. To say the least, this manner of giving the gospel to the world is uncalled-for; God forbids it; the Bible is against it. "Thus saith the Lord, I hate robbery for burnt offering." To obey is better than to sacrifice. We as a people profess to be clear of this kind of iniquity. Let us see to it that our skirts are free from all contamination with the system.

P. S. Brethren wishing information on this subject can obtain it through the American Baptist, published at Utica, N. THE CONDITION OF HAYTI.

To the Editors of the Sabbath Recorder:—

The condition of Hayti, as set forth in an article copied from a Boston paper into the 22d No. of your paper, is represented to be quite prosperous. Having some personal acquaintance with that Island and with its inhabitants, I can say, that there is a manifest retrograde or down-hill movement in every thing that relates to their prosperity. The Government discourages instead of encouraging Education. The army is increasing, and the exports of commerce decreasing. As to the course of Mr. Green, who was sent to Hayti last spring, I believe it was very satisfactory to every foreigner on the island; at least, he behaved himself with manifest uprightness. If the Haytiens were prejudiced against this country and government through his visit, it is undoubtedly their fault, and certainly nothing new. The gentleman referred to in the article in question is perhaps one of that class who have no conscientious regard for truth. If not so, his statement would have been a different one. I was very much astonished to see such a statement published in the Boston Journal, inasmuch as the real condition of things is so well known to the friends of the people there, i. e., to those who are deeply interested for their moral and political welfare.

Yours, WM. M. JONES.

THE NASHVILLE CONVENTION.—This assemblage of the "chivalry" adjourned sine die on the 18th inst., amid great noise and confusion. What it has done, seems to be a question in dispute. Some of the papers represent it as a failure, while others think it has accomplished something, but they can scarcely say what. A dispatch from the President of the Convention to the Southern Press, says:—

> "The Convention adjourned after adopting a Preamble, the same as offered by Gov. Clay of Alabama, and Resolutions framed from those of Mississippi. They affirm the right of secession—denounce the acts of Congress as unjust, and recommend a General Congress of Southern States to maintain the rights of the South, and if possible to preserve the Union. No time for reässembling has been designated."

The N. Y. Tribune, in commenting upon the Convention, and the prospect of disunion says:—

> "Beside South Carolina, and possibly Mississippi, there is not a State in the South that would secede from the Union if freely permitted to do so. Kentucky, Tennessee, and Louisiana, would vote five to one against such a proposition. Virginia and North Carolina nearly the same. If the door of the Union were held wide open for their egress, South Carolina might coax Mississippi to step out with her, but never another State—and there would be a desperate and doubtful struggle in Mississippi. There would scarcely be an organized attempt to secede in any States but these and Georgia."

ACCIDENT LAST SABBATH.—On Sabbath morning last, Nov. 23d, at 7 o'clock, while the men on board the propeller Resolute, lying at the foot of pier No. 13, East River, New York, were at breakfast, the bottom of the boiler burst, killing the engineer, William Shepard, on the spot, and scalding five others in so dreadful a manner that four of them have since died—namely, S. F. Hall, Woodhull Kemble, Thomas Watts, Joseph Plummer, and Woodhull Hartman, the captain. It is not expected that the other one will live. The cause of this terrible catastrophe has not been fully investigated at the time of writing this paragraph. The engine and machinery had been running but a short time, and the boiler was considered perfectly safe.

REVIVAL IN HOPKINTON, R. I.—We spent three days in Rhode Island last week, and were cheered to find a pleasant revival in progress at a place called "The Valley," within the bounds of the first Hopkinton church. Eld. Chas. M. Lewis has been holding meetings there nearly every evening for a month past, and between forty and fifty persons have professed conversion and received baptism. The meeting was to be removed to the school-house at Potter's Hill at the beginning of the present week. May the work extend over that whole region, and throughout our churches.

REPORTS OF OUR SOCIETIES.—The Annual Reports of the Missionary, Tract, and Publishing Societies are ready for distribution. Parcels have been put up for each church in the denomination, which will be forwarded by the first opportunity. Those for the churches within the bounds of the Western Association will be sent to Alfred in the course of the present week.

SABBATH-SCHOOL PAPER.—The Seventh-day Baptist Publishing Society proposes to issue, about the first of January, 1851, a Monthly Paper devoted to the interests of Sabbath Schools and Bible Classes. Communications suited to such a paper are solicited, and may be directed to this office.

Mrs. Sarah Hale, of Newburyport, Mass., has given 5,000 acres of land in Illinois to Beloit College. The interest of the fund will be directed to support a Professorship of Mathematics and Natural Philosophy, styled the Hale Professorship.

BRAZILIAN LAW AGAINST THE SLAVE TRADE.—We have already noticed the adoption by the Brazilian Senate of a law intended to suppress the slave-trade. It went into operation on the 4th of September last, and if it should be carried out (as we fear it will not) would do more than all efforts heretofore made to put an end to the nefarious traffic. The following are its provisions:—

> Brazilian men-of-war are ordered to use special efforts to seize slavers, and to hand over their crews and officers to the civil tribunals for trial. The ships and cargoes are to be sold at auction, and the proceeds, after deducting $40 for the expense of sending back to Africa each recaptured negro, divided as prize money among the officers and crew of the ship making the capture. The party denouncing a slaver to the Government is also to share in the prize money. No Brazilian vessel is to be allowed to clear for the Coast of Africa without the owner's giving security that it shall not take slaves on board. The introduction of slaves into any part of the Empire is made piracy, and punishable with death. A special law, hereafter to be framed, will determine the punishment to be inflicted on captains of slavers.

RELIGIOUS DISPUTES IN SWITZERLAND.—Religious disputes are running very high at the present time in Switzerland. The Government of the Grisons have established a college at Coire for the education of both Protestants and Catholics. The Bishop of Coire set his face against this mixed system of education, and addressed a circular to his clergy to prevent their flocks from attending them. The Government, indignant at the conduct of the Bishop, called together the Grand Council of the Canton; and, in order to prevent any such interference for the future, brought forward a motion to the effect that the distribution of no episcopal circulars should be allowed without a special and previous permission from the Government. The question was brought before the Grand Council on the 30th of October. A violent discussion ensued. The Catholic members, with the exception of two, protested against the measure, and left the meeting before it came to a vote. The question was then put to the vote, and the proposition of the Government voted unanimously. The Catholic papers are indignant at this vote, which they call a fresh instance of Protestant intolerance.

JENNY LIND'S MOVEMENTS.—Jenny Lind's Concerts in New York closed last week. The present week she goes to Philadelphia, and after giving a few concerts there she is to go successively to Baltimore, Washington, Charleston, Havana, New Orleans, St. Louis, Cincinnati, and so back by way of the Lakes. She will arrive in New York early in the Spring, and will give another series of Concerts before her final adieu to America. The Buffalo Daily Courier, on the authority of Mr. Barnum, says that in addition to the above-named places, Miss Lind will give one concert in Detroit, two in Cleveland, two in Buffalo, one in Rochester, one in Syracuse, one in Utica, and one or two in Albany.

GEO. THOMPSON AND THE COLORED PEOPLE.—After being mobbed by the respectable whites of Boston, because they were afraid he might say something against slavery, Mr. Thompson was received by the colored people of Boston on Second-day evening, Nov. 18. Strict order was maintained by the police. Chas. L. Remond, a colored man, and a gifted speaker, welcomed Mr. Thompson, and the latter replied at length, in a strain of eloquent remark, congratulating the audience on the progress of emancipation, speaking warmly of Clarkson and Wilberforce, of the abolition in the French Colonies, of the earnest attention now universally paid to the subject of slavery, &c.

A SAD CASE.—At the Mansion House, in Baltimore, on the evening of Nov. 19, a young man about 26 years of age, named Richard A. Whelton, of Virginia, committed suicide by taking a quarter of an ounce of arsenic. He was studying Divinity, and had been sent by Dr. Johns of the Episcopal Church to an institution for young clergymen in Ohio, but proving dull in his studies, they had declined retaining him. His mortification and pecuniary embarrassments induced the act.

A GOOD IDEA.—It is stated in some of the papers, that a clergyman of the Church of England, with the approbation of Prince Albert, proposes to give a prize, or prizes, of one hundred guineas in amount, for the best essay, or essays, on the following subject:—"In what manner the union of all nations, at the grand Exhibition of 1851, may be made the most conducive to the glory of God, in promoting the moral welfare of mankind?"

THE YOUTH'S CABINET for January, 1851, (the first number of the sixth volume,) is on our table—an attractive number of that always neat and readable work. The new costume in which the new volume commences, shows that in respect to appearance, as well as literary character, the editor and publisher are determined that this magazine shall take the lead of all works of its class.

We learn from the Boston Traveller, that on Friday night, the existence of a third ring around the planet Saturn, which had been for some time suspected, was ascertained by the astronomers at Cambridge. It is inferior to the two others, and therefore its distance from the body of Saturn must be small. The eighth satellite of this planet was also discovered at Cambridge, by Mr. Bond, about two years since.

The President on the Fugitive Slave Law.

The following letter of the President of the United States to Robert Collins, the claimant of Crafts of Boston as a fugitive slave, is a very satisfactory reply to the question, which has been mooted for a month past, whether the military was to be called into use to enforce the fugitive slave law.

State Department,
Washington, Saturday, Nov. 9.

Sir: I am instructed by the President to inform you, that your letter of the 2d inst., addressed to him, inclosing several slips from newspapers, in reference to the proceedings of a portion of the community of Boston on the subject of the Fugitive Slave Law, was received by him yesterday, and that he has given to the letter and its inclosures careful perusal. You state in substance, that you are the owner of Crafts, one of the Fugitive Slaves for whom warrants of arrest were issued in Boston, and call the President's attention to the inclosed slips, taken mostly from Northern papers, by which he will perceive the manner in which your agents were received and treated for merely asking that the slaves be returned, according to the laws of the United States—that they have been arrested under various warrants as kidnappers, and on other frivolous pretenses, and unreasonable bail demanded, and that your friends have become their sureties for more than $20,000. You also say that many cases in which officers have not performed their duty, will appear from the slips, and that warrants now lie dead in the Marshal's office. You then speak of the pernicious effect of such proceedings, and of their tendency to disturb the harmony of the Union, and of the great importance of having the law faithfully executed, and finally inquire whether it is not the intention of the Executive of the United States to cause that law to be faithfully and properly enforced.

To this the President directs me to reply, that you cannot be more deeply impressed than he is with the importance of having every law faithfully executed. Every statute in this country, passed in accordance with the provisions of the Constitution, must be presumed to embody the will of a majority of the people of the Union, and as such is entitled to the respect and obedience of every true American citizen, and the Constitution which the President has sworn to support, has made it his especial duty to take care that the laws be faithfully executed. He has no thought of shrinking from his duty in this or in any other case, but will to the utmost of his ability firmly and faithfully perform it. But how is he to cause the laws to be executed? First, by appointing proper officers to fill the various offices and discharge their various functions with diligence and fidelity. And if any shall be found incompetent or unfaithful, by removing them, where he has power of removal, and appointing more competent and faithful officers in their places. Secondly, in extreme cases, whenever the laws of the United States shall be opposed, or the execution thereof obstructed in any State by combinations too powerful to be suppressed by the ordinary course of judicial proceedings, or by powers vested in civil officers, with powers which the law authorizes and requires them to call to their aid, it would be his duty to call forth the Militia, and use the Army and Navy for the purpose of overcoming such forcible combinations against the laws. But in either case prudence and justice require that there should be more satisfactory evidence of official delinquency or forcible resistance than mere rumor or newspaper statements, and yet these are all which have been furnished in this case. If any Marshal neglects to perform his duty the law gives the right of action to the aggrieved party for the injury which he may sustain, and if he refuse to perform it, the statute has imposed upon him a severe penalty. But if he refuse, or willfully neglect to perform it, when this shall be satisfactorily made to appear to the President, then, in addition to his liability to the aggrieved party, it would doubtless be the duty of the Executive to remove him from office and appoint another in his place. But your letter contains no proof of this kind, and therefore seems to require no action. It is equally clear that no case is presented justifying a call upon the militia, or the use of the army to execute the laws, and the President has so much confidence in the patriotism and devotion to the laws which has always characterized a large majority of the people of Boston, that he cannot for a moment believe that it will ever be necessary to call in any extraordinary aid to execute the laws in that city. Individuals may become excited, and may in the heat of the moment offer resistance to the laws, but he has no doubt that in such an event—so much to be regretted—the good sense of the community would soon rally to support the civil authorities, and that those sustaining the law would triumph. But he directs me to assure you that if, unfortunately, he should find himself mistaken in this, and the painful necessity should arise, he should perform his duty by employing all the means which the Constitution and Congress have placed at his disposal to enforce the law.

As to the complaint that your agents were unjustly prosecuted and held to bail in unreasonable amounts for pretended offenses, the President directs me to say, that however he may regret any such injustice and incivility, he is not aware that he has power to remedy the evil. If the complaints against your agents be unfounded, the defendants will doubtless be acquitted; and, if malicious, they have their remedy in an action for a malicious prosecution. But all these are Judicial questions, over which the Executive can exercise no control, and the evil complained of results from the acknowledged right of every individual to prosecute any one for an alledged offense or violation of right. The importance of avoiding as far as practicable all causes of irritation between the North and the South, and especially on the exciting subject of Slavery, were he permitted to advise, he would suggest to all the importance of permitting the laws to take their usual course, and that every thing tending to intimidation, or illegal or unjust annoyance, should be scrupulously avoided. Every effort should be made to cultivate a fraternal feeling. We should be a people of one interest and one sentiment, knowing no local division, and tolerating no sectional injustice. Our Union, so dear to the heart of every true American, can only be preserved by a strict observance of the Constitution and impartial administration of the laws.

I am Sir, respectfully, your ob't serv't,
W. S. DERRICK, Acting Secretaty.
To Robert Collins, Esq., Macon, Ga.

One Week Later from Europe.

The steamer Niagara, with Liverpool dates to Nov. 9, arrived at New York on the 21st. We give the substance of the news brought by her.

A grand banquet has been given by the Lord Mayor of London to the Directors of the various Railways connected with that Capital. Hon. Abbot Lawrence was present on that occasion and delivered a speech.

The Commissioners in charge of the Exhibition of the Industry of all Nations, announce that the demands made for space by the exhibitors already greatly exceed the capabilities of the Crystal Palace, and they appeal to the public generally to be at once prompt and generous in transmitting their pecuniary contributions.

From Germany the important item is the entry of the Bavarian troops into Hesse Cassel, and the entire submission of Prussia to the decrees of Nicholas the Autocrat of Europe. Of course, with this result in the interior of Germany, Schleswig-Holstein must also be forced into submission.

In Bosnia a revolt against the Turkish authorities has taken place. A telegraphic dispatch of Oct. 26, from Zara, states that the fortified town of Mostar, which is in open revolt, is invested by Omer Pasha. The Vizier is watched in his villa, and his son is a hostage in the hands of the inhabitants of Mostar. The Turkish population has joined the revolution party in the Herzegovina, at the head of which is Osman Bey.

From Turkey we have the news of a terrible calamity, which happened at Constantinople on the 23d of Oct. The Capitan, Pasha's line of battle ship, blew up at the arsenal, killiing upwards of 1,000 people, who were on board. She had only arrived from a cruise two days since, and was landing her powder.

Ten Days Later from California.

Two steamers—the Crescent City and the Ohio—have arrived at New York from Chagres since our last. The Crescent City brought 350 passengers, and over a million dollars in gold dust. The Ohio brought 350 passengers, and about $800,000 in gold dust.

The news of the admission of California was received with great rejoicing, firing of guns, &c.

The situation of the overland emigrants continues to be described as extremely dreadful. Starvation and disease contend among them which shall destroy the most victims.

Gold-diggers are moderately prosperous—those who are willing to work gaining from eight dollars to an ounce per day; and some lucky hombres get hold, semi-occasionally, of big lumps, weighing all the way from $100 to $5,000. But these latter are scarce—almost as scarce as honest office-seekers.

Many of the damming companies on the Stanislaus and Toulumne Rivers are becoming discouraged, and giving up their claims, after bestowing so much time and labor upon them.

A lump of pure gold weighing 13 pounds has been found in the town of Sonora, by a Mexican. It was discovered in the creek running between Sonora proper and the Sonorian camp.

The Sacramento papers inform us that a communication was received from Dr. Hastings by the Common Council of that city congratulatory on the restoration of Mayor Bigelow, accompanied with a professional bill of $4,000 for attendance on him, and one from Dr. Bowie for $500 as consulting physician.

A San Francisco letter says: "We have had several cases of Cholera, originating here, and many are under great apprehensions that this disease will be extremely fatal to our population; but I think their fears are groundless. The purity of the atmosphere and the high winds are unfavorable to its propagation among us."

A large number of murders and Indian outrages are reported by this arrival; also several cases of lynching.

A most horrible murder was committed at the Mormon Gulch. The unfortunate victims were Italians, and had $3,000 in gold dust in their possession. Suspicion rests on three Chilians and two negroes.

The Placer Times contains the details of a murderous transaction, which is horrible even to read about. Two Chinamen, working on the north branch of the Calaveras, and who were known to have some half-dozen pounds of dust, were visited by some neighboring white persons; one of the Chinese was instantly killed by a blow from a crow-bar, and the other knocked down, his skull fractured, his arm shattered in fending off the blows, robbed and left for dead, where he remained through three days and nights, through rain and heat.

A Family Cast Away on Lake Superior.

A Mr. Griswold, wife and small child, with a boy about seventeen, the son of a Mr. Haverstraw, set out a few weeks since in a skiff from Eagle Harbor, to reach Eagle river, some ten miles distant up the coast. Witherell was engaged building a Government Lighthouse on the point projecting out into the Harbor from the main land, and saw the company as they rounded the point on their perilous voyage. It was then blowing quite strongly off land, and fears were entertained that a shift of the wind would beach them on a bold and bad shore. Determined to have plenty of leeway, the little craft was observed to put out some distance into the lake, and was soon lost sight of. It never reached its destination. Days and weeks passed, nothing was heard from the adventurers. The coast between the two points was daily traversed, and pieces of the wreck supposed to be found, but no tidings of the sufferers. At length all hope was given up and their friends mourned them as dead. But the sequel proved otherwise. After three week's absence, this little crew were all found safe at the Saut. They had been picked up two weeks before by a coasting schooner on the Canada shore, whither they had been seven days drifting. The distance across the lake at that point must be from 250 to 300 miles. It appears that the boat got too far from shore, and the wind increasing, drove them into the lake. Night came on, and the wind not abating, the boat was put in charge of the lad, who was a half-breed and well acquainted with the lake. He got up a sort of sail and put before the wind for the Canada shore. Seven days and nights they spent on this lonely sea without seeing a vessel, without shelter and without food. The wind changed several times and kept them for days out of sight of land. When found, they had entirely surrendered themselves to their fate. How they lived so long under such exposure and without food, is a most unparalleled mystery. Their discovery was a mere accident by the schooner, which, solitary and alone, happened to be coasting along the Canada shore.

Sackett's Harbor and Saratoga Railroad.—This enterprise seems just now to be receiving considerable attention. A meeting was held at Saratoga last week, to hear the report of Mr. Tilden, the Engineer who has been throughout the line making a preliminary survey. There were a large number present from the counties of Jefferson, Lewis, Fulton, Warren, and Saratoga, with a few from New York, Albany, and Boston. Mr. Tilden reported the route to be a feasible one, there being no grades to exceed forty feet to the mile. It will be about 140 miles in length; traversing the counties of Jefferson, Lewis, Hamilton, Fulton and Saratoga. The State, in the charter, gave a preemption right to two hundred and forty thousand acres of land lying in those Counties, at the nominal price of five cents per acre, and Messrs. Tilden and Morehouse stated that they held written pledges from large landholders on the proposed line, offering nearly as much as a gift to the Company if the road should be built. It is said that there are extensive beds of iron ore lying on the line of the road—that the road would bring into market large quantities of lumber—and that as a through route from the Upper Lakes to Boston and New York it would be preferable to any other for freight and passengers.

A White Family Arrested as Fugitive Slaves.—The New Albany (Indiana) Register of Nov. 12, says: Three persons were yesterday brought before Esq. Joseyly, charged by a man named Dennis Framell, of Arkansas, with being fugitive slaves. The alledged fugitives are, a woman about 55 years of age; her daughter, about 35; and a son of the latter, a boy of 7 or 8. They were put in jail till to-morrow, when the testimony in the case will be examined. What is singular about this case is that the so-called fugitives are, to all appearances, white persons. No trace of negro or Indian blood is discernible in the oldest woman nor in the boy. Some few of those who have seen the other woman think there is a slight resemblance to the Indian in some of her features, but a large majority are of the opinion that she also is of purely white origin. They have been living in the city some four months, during which time the boy—said to be quite sprightly—has been going to one of our schools, and mingling with white children, no one suspecting him to be any thing else than white, like themselves. About ten days ago the family were enticed across the river, where they were put on a boat bound South, but when in the neighborhood of Hawesville were (as they say,) put on shore by the passengers, and made their way back here. The oldest woman says that she is a native of Baltimore; that many years age her husband was killed by Indians, and she and her daughter carried away captive by them, among whom she has ever since lived—latterly in Arkansas, but are not slaves, and were never treated as such.

Cholera in Jamaica.—The following is an extract of a letter, dated at Kingston, Jamaica, 8th Nov. 1850, received at Havana for the steamer of the 12th inst.:—

"I regret to report that the Island, especially our City, has been and still is suffering from the Cholera. We have had over 1,000 deaths from the 10th of October to the 7th inst., within the City alone, and in other parts of the Island there have been say about 600. Business is quite suspended, and in all parts everybody is at work in relieving the wants of the poor and sick."

Counterfeit Notes.—Thompson's Bank Note Reporter gives the following list of new counterfeits:—

Fives on the Farmers and Mechanics' Bank, Ct.; 10's on the Iron Bank, Ct.; 10's on the Farmers' Bank, Arietta, N. Y.; 100's on the Bank of the State, S. C.; 2's on the Adams Bank, N. Y.; 20's on the Western Bank, N. Y.; 5's on the Farmers' Bank, Bridgeport, Conn.; 10's on the State Bank, Hartford, Conn.; 2's on the Unadilla Bank, N. Y.; 10's on the Windham County Bank, Conn.; 5's on the Pacific Bank, Broadway N. Y.: 4's on the Providence Bank, R. I.; 3's on the Princeton Bank, N. J.

A Hard Case.—We saw, says the Rochester Advertiser, a large family of colored people preparing to take the steamer Admiral this morning for Canada. They are fugitives from slavery, but have resided in town some years. Their sobriety, industry, and the general cleanliness that surrounded their dwelling, made it a matter of regret among their neighbors, that they should be obliged to leave under fear of re-capture. The man has pursued his avocation in the city, until navigation has nearly drawn to a close, and now goes to Canada, preferring a poor chance of a winter's employment there, to sustain his family, to remaining here in fear of being again made a slave.

Recovery of Gold.—Mr. J. Counsellor, conductor of one of the trains of the New Jersey Railroad, on arriving at Jersey City on Friday morning discovered lying on the platform of one of the cars a package containing five or six pounds of the richest gold dust, and several specimens of gold; on examination, he found it to be the property of a Mr. Belant, of Newark, who has just returned from California, and who did not discover his loss till he got into New York. He immediately re-crossed the ferry, when, to his joy, he received his treasure. [Trib.

Caution to Rail-Road Officers.—Heavy Damages.—In the case of Thomas Keyes, vs. Wm. B. Lawton and others, for assault and battery, tried before the Supreme Court of Rhode Island, the Jury returned a verdict for the plaintiff for $10,000. The Providence Journal says that the action was brought for an assault committed upon the plaintiff while a passenger in the Stonington cars, by the defendants, who were officers in the cars, and for a forcible ejectment from the cars in the night time. The defendant, Mr. Keyes, is a carpenter, and belongs to Boston. It appears that he made a remark about the smoky appearance of the cars, which led to hard words with the conductor, and his violent expulsion from the train.

SUMMARY.

A case was tried at Havre de Grace, on the 5th inst., before a magistrate's court, in which the receiver of the Havre de Grace Bank was plaintiff, and the maker of a promissory note due the Bank, defendant. The action was for the recovery of the amount of the note, for which the defendant offered the issue of the Bank in payment, which, upon being refused by the plaintiff, a judgment was rendered in favor of the defendant. The case has been appealed to the County Court.

The Charleston Mercury publishes a memorial to the Legislature of South Carolina, asking for the establishment of powder mills, foundries for the casting of cannon, and factories of guns, swords, and pistols, all by way of getting that super-valiant State prepared for the momentous time when it shall declare its "independence from all the world," and establish its "first dependence on itself."

The Jamestown Journal says the New York and Erie Railroad Company have taken the subject of a branch road between Erie and Little Valley, into consideration. Mr. Swift, one of the Superintending Engineers on that road, with a competent corps, recently passed through Jamestown from Little Valley, on a tour of exploration, and survey of the route. They represented the grades, &c., as very favorable as far as they had proceeded.

The New Orleans papers state that further developments are being made, showing that the most extensive swindles in spurious money on record, are continually being perpetrated in San Francisco. It is estimated that nearly $50,000 in spurious bank bills on Banks of North and South Carolina was brought over and came to New Orleans in the hands of passengers on the Ohio.

The Blairsville (Pa.) Apalachian contains an account of a series of riots which have recently taken place among the laborers on the railroad near that place. The riots commenced by an attempt on the part of the Far Downs (north of Ireland men) to drive the Leinster men from the road. Two men were killed and several others wounded.

The Poughkeepsie Telegraph gives an account of a series of riots between the Fardowners and the Connaught men employed on the Hudson River Railroad near Rhinebeck. Numerous shantees were pulled down, which led to the arrest of 60 rioters, of whom 22 were committed after examination before a Justice of the Peace.

DIED.

In Waterford, Ct., Nov. 20th, Elder Lester T. Rogers, after an illness of several weeks, during which he exemplified in a most striking and pleasing manner the power and blessedness of that faith which he had professed, and for the defense of which he had for many years, with great fidelity and constancy, discharged the duties of a Minister of the Gospel and Pastor of the Seventh-day Baptist Church in Waterford, where he was born, and where he was his father's successor as Pastor of the same Church. Elder Rogers had served the Church at Waterford uninterruptedly for twenty-seven years, and died at the age of fifty-two. The meekness, patience, constancy, fidelity, and piety, for which he was indeed remarkable, occasion a degree of mourning on account of his death that is quite unusual, and which is calculated to enlist our sympathies in favor of his bereaved companion and family, and a sorrowing Church. For, whether we contemplate our departed brother as a husband, a father, a pastor, or a Christian citizen, he had just those qualities, and that demeanor, which were calculated to give rise to and perpetuate a very peculiar and strong attachment and feeling of affection. But since Elder Rogers rests from his labors, let the afflicted be comforted, and find in God a reparation of all the loss they suffer in the death of a husband, a father, or a shepherd of the flock. In Richland, Oswego Co., N. Y., Oct. 19th, Mrs Mercy Payne, in the 73d year of her age. Sister Payne was born Nov., 1777, in Windham, Mass., where, at the age of 23 years, she was hopefully converted to God, and united with a Baptist Church of that place, of which she was a useful member for a period of about twelve years, when with her family she removed to Nelson, Madison Co., N. Y., where she again united with a Baptist Church at Morrisville, with which she walked in fellowship until about the year 1832, when she removed to Richland. Here she again united with a Baptist Church, to which she was an ornament while she continued to be a member. Having investigated the subject of the Sabbath in the light of the Bible, and becoming convinced that her former practice was not in accordance thereto, she readily embraced and observed the seventh day of the week as the Sabbath of the Lord her God, and in April, 1843, united with the Seventh-day Baptist Church in Richland, of which she was a member until her death. She died as she had lived, in the enjoyment of the Christian faith; and as she had been a lover of the Bible, she urged upon those around her the necessity of learning their duty therefrom. She selected, as the foundation of her funeral discourse, John 5: 39—"Search the Scriptures," &c. W. V. H.

In Hopkinton, R. I., Nov. 3d, Harriet Lewis, daughter of Thomas and Fally Lewis, 29 years of age. She was a member of the first Seventh-day Baptist Church in Hopkinton, and in her last sickness, which was lingering and painful in the extreme, she gave evidence of the power of grace in the soul—no murmuring or complaining amidst the painful struggles of nature. She died in full hope of a glorious immortality and eternal life.

In this city, on the evening of Nov. 24th, Mr. David Burt. His remains were accompanied to Schenectady by the family of his son-in-law, T. B. Stillman.

Proclamation,

By Hamilton Fish, Governor of the State of N. Y

The mercies of an all-kind Providence call for an acknowledgment of gratitude and of dependence from the creatures of his bounties.

The year which is about to close has been marked by innumerable blessings to us as a Nation. Abundant harvest and profitable labor have brought rich rewards to honest industry. Peace and tranquility are established at home; and no discord disturbs our relations abroad. Health, prosperity, and abundance, have been freely vouchsafed to us. Civil and religious liberty prevail throughout the length and breadth of the land. And to us all is secured the free exercise of the worship of their Creator according to their own faith. And on this occasion we should not forget, that while an inscrutable Providence has seen fit to remove during the past year the Chief Magistrate of our Union, that same Providence has preserved us under the trial a free and united People, has saved us from anarchy or civil commotion, and has continued to us the mild operation of a Government of our own adoption and rulers of our own choice.

I do, therefore, designate and recommend THURSDAY, the twelfth day of December next, to be observed by the good People of this State as a day of Public Thanksgiving to Almighty God.

In witness whereof I have hereunto subscribed my name and affixed the Privy Seal of the State, [l. s.] at the City of Albany, the 31st day of October, one thousand eight hundred and fifty.
HAMILTON FISH.

Robert H. Morris, Private Secretary.

Miscellaneous.

October.

BY WILLIAM CULLEN BRYANT.

Ay, thou art welcome, heaven's delicious breath,
When woods begin to wear the crimson leaf,
And suns grow meek, and the meek suns grow brief,
And the year smiles as it draws near its death.
Wind of the sunny south, oh! still delay
In the gay woods and in the golden air,
Like to a good old age relieved from care,
Journeying in long serenity away.
In such a bright, late quiet, would that I
Might wear out life like thee, 'mid bowers and brooks,
And dearer yet, the sunshine of kind looks,
And murmur of kind voices, ever nigh;
And, when my last sand twinkled in the glass,
Pass silently from men as thou dost pass.

The Sphere of Woman.

Elizabeth W. Pillsbury writes from Lowell to the N. Y. Tribune a long letter in review of the proceedings of the Woman's Rights Convention recently held at Worcester, Mass. The following passage from the letter gives her idea (as well as that of many others) in relation to the sphere of woman:

"Once upon a time, in our City of Spindles, there was a dove-eyed, unassuming little girl, who attracted the attention and won the affection of a young man, quite a thoughtless, unsettled sort of a character—both moving in the humbler walks of life—and she became his wife. After a little while they left Lowell; the young man began to be heard of as a writer of some talent in light literature, and became associate editor of the 'Boston Galaxy,' a paper of some note at that time. The next we heard of him he had removed to your City of Gotham, occupied a very respectable position in society, was associated with N. P. Willis and others in conducting a large and very popular family newspaper. After a lapse of some years he became a resident of Philadelphia, honorably and profitably engaged in literary pursuits, and a very popular editor. At length we heard of him as taking holy orders and devoting his talent as a writer and teacher in the cause of religion. And where was his little, gentle wife during all these years of his progress onward and upward? I never saw her name associated with his upon the title-page of a book, nor do I believe she was ever seen sharing with him the chair editorial. She was scarcely heard of out of the circle of their fireside friends, and these contenders for woman's rights might have imagined she had quietly sunk into a nonentity, "slave in the kitchen or puppet in the parlor." It was not so. She had performed her part in beauty and harmony, and when she was taken from earth to occupy her place in a higher, more glorious sphere, the following tribute from the pen of her husband told that she was appreciated:

"Pardon us, then, if there be any shortcoming or palpable error in our labors. Think of the head weary with long watching—the heart sick with loneliness—the right hand weak in the absence of the support which it received from the dearest of friends and counsellors from the earliest manhood. Think of the vacant chair, to the occupant of which—now in the silent grave—the writer had many years been in the habit of referring his dilemmas for solution—his difficulties for enlightenment—his course for approval; and in all this time, it is his honest tribute to say, that he never did wrong when he followed her counsel; while her entreaties when he was obstinate, and her tears when he persisted in contumacy, have often checked him in folly or won him from ill-advised purposes."

Jenny Lind.

The following sketch of Jenny Lind, from the pen of Hans Christian Anderson, one of the most gifted and distinguished literary men of Sweden, will be read with interest. It is published in his work entitled the "True Story of my Life:"—

Let us now go back to the year 1840. One day in my hotel at Copenhagen, I saw the name of Jenny Lind among those of the Swedish strangers. That same year I had been in the neighboring country, and had been received with much honor and kindness. It would not, therefore, be an unbecoming thing on my part, were I to visit the young artist. At this time she was almost entirely unknown out of Sweden; even in Copenhagen her name was known to but few. She received me with great courtesy, but distantly and coldly. She was, she said, on a journey with her father to South Sweden, and was merely come over to Copenhagen to see the city. We shortly separated, and I had the impression left upon me of a very ordinary character. It soon, however, passed away, and I had forgotten Jenny Lind. In the Autumn of 1843, Jenny Lind again came to Copenhagen. Boumonville, the ballet master, one of my friends, had married a Swedish lady, a friend of the fair singer. He informed me of her arrival, and told me that she remembered me very kindly, and had now read some of my writings. He entreated me to go with him and make a call upon her. I did so. I was no longer received as a stranger. She cordially extended her hand. She spoke of my writings, and of her friend Miss Fredrika Bremer. The conversation then turned upon her appearance in Copenhagen. "I have never made my appearance out of Sweden," said she. "Everybody in my own land is so affectionate and loving to me. If I made my appearance here, and should be hissed! I dare not venture on it." I said that I, it was true, could not pass judgment upon her, having never heard her sing; but that, nevertheless, I felt convinced that such then was the disposition in Copenhagen, that she was certain to be successful. Boumonville's persuasion eventually gained for the Copenhageners the greatest enjoyment they ever had. Jenny made her appearance in the part of Alice. It was a new revelation in the realms of art. The fresh young voice found its way into every heart. Here truth and nature reigned. Everything was full of meaning and intelligence. At one concert she sung her Swedish songs. They were so peculiar and so bewitching, that, uttered by such a purely feminine being, they exercised an omnipotent sway. The whole of Copenhagen was enraptured. The first artist to whom the Danish students gave a serenade was Jenny Lind. Torches blazed around the villa where the serenade was given. She came out and expressed her thanks by singing one of her Swedish songs. I saw her then hasten into the darkest corner of the room we were in, and weep for emotion. "Yes, yes," she said, "I will exert myself. You shall see that I will be better qualified when I again visit Copenhagen." On the stage she is the great artist who rises above all that are around her. In her own chamber she is a young and sensitive girl, possessed with all the humility and piety of a child. In Copenhagen her advent made an epoch in the history of our opera. She showed our art in all its sanctity. I had beheld one of its vestals. She returned to Stockholm. Thence Fredrika Bremer wrote to me—"We are both of us agreed as to Jenny Lind as a singer. She stands as high as any artist of our time well can stand. But as yet you do not know her in her real greatness. Speak to her of art, and you will wonder at the expansion of her mind. Her countenance is lighted with inspiration. Converse with her upon God, and of the holiness of religion, and tears will spring from those innocent eyes. She is a great artist, but she is still greater in the pure humanity of her existence." Indeed, nothing can lessen the impression made by Jenny Lind's greatness on the stage, save her personal character in her own home. Her intelligent and child-like disposition here excites a singular power. She is happy, belonging no longer to the world. Yet she loves art with her whole soul. She feels her vocation. Her noble and pious disposition cannot be spoiled by homage. On one occasion only, in my hearing, did she express joy and self-consciousness in her talent. It was during her last stay in Copenhagen. Every evening ning she appeared either at the concerts or in opera. She heard of a society, the object of which was to take unfortunate children out of the hands of their parents, by whom they were compelled to beg or steal, and place them in better circumstances. Benevolent people subscribed annually for their support, yet the means for this excellent purpose were but small. "I have an evening disengaged," said she; "I will give a performance for these poor children, but we must have double prices." Such a performance was given, and returned large proceeds. When she heard the amount, her countenance lit up, and tears filled her eyes. "It is beautiful," said she, "that I can sing so."

Dr. Buckland and George Stephenson.

Once upon a time, at the gathering of the "fine spirits" at Drayton Manor, Dr. Buckland, Sir William Follett, and Mr. George Stephenson, were among the guests assembled. Sir William having the leading professor of geology at the same table with the expounder of new notions on stratification, contrived to bring them into intellectual collision. Mr. Stephenson disputed the facts of the formation as alledged, and Dr. Buckland defended them; and the latter combated the arguments of his opponent with such happy fluency and facile reference, that he crushed his adversary with as much apparent ease as one of the engineer's own locomotives would an obtruding rabbit, when the engine was going at the rate of forty miles an hour. Mr. Stephenson felt that he was worsted, not defeated; but being, pleasantly and politely, "chafed," the efforts he made to recover his position only served to aggravate the pain of his wounds. Although it was but a friendly controversy, he was considerably irritated, and slept but little that night. He was up early next morning, and sought to cool his temper in the spacious garden of Drayton Manor. He had not taken many turns on the silicia when Sir William Follett made his appearance. His first salutation was, "George, you made a pretty fool of yourself last night." "I have a strong suspicion of that kind myself, Sir William," replied Mr. Stephenson; "but I am convinced that I was right after all." "To be sure you were," said Sir William; "but you cannot talk. I never heard such a bungler. You were full of facts—wonderful facts—and Buckland had only sophistry and assertion to oppose to your facts. He beat you to a stand-still because you had no rhetoric." "Sir William, I am no lawyer." "But I am. Come, sit down in this alcove; and now, before we are called to breakfast, repeat to me your whole theory." Mr. Stephenson did as Sir William wished. He went through the process of fire and water, the operation of electricity, the nature of faults, the position of strata. "That will do," said Sir William. "Now at dinner today hold your tongue; leave Buckland to me." After dinner, Buckland, excited by the triumph of the previous evening, soon introduced mineralogy. Sir William, in his gentle, quiet way, drew him into a controversy, closed upon him, out-talked him, and prostrated the professor as effectually as the professor had overthrown the engineer the evening before. Sir William enjoyed the encounter; no one was displeased; and as they rose to retire, Sir William whispered, "George, what do you think now?" "Think!" replied Mr. Stephenson. "I think there is nothing on earth like the gift of gab."

Flowering Hyacinths in Glasses of Water.

Fill the glass with water up to the neck. Place the bulb in the cup-shaped part of the glass, and renew the water from time, as it begins to get muddy. When the water is changed the bulb should not be taken out, unless the roots are short and few, but the hand should be placed over the top of the glass, so as to retain the bulb in its place, and the water carefully and slowly turned off. This is done to prevent any injury to the long roots, which are brittle, and easily broken, and the plant is seriously injured by their being in an imperfect state. When one of the long roots is broken, it should be cut off with a sharp knife close to the bulb.

When the bulbs are first put in the glasses, they should be placed in the dark until the roots begin to grow, but as soon as this is the case they ought to be in a warm room near the light, when the plants will grow rapidly. In choosing Hyacinths for water-glasses, the red and blue flowers are preferable to those which are white and yellow, the latter two having a fragrance too powerful for rooms; and besides, they flower weaker in glasses than the others.

Growing Hyacinths in pots of soil require no particular care. To ensure a vigorous growth, the pots ought to be deeper than usual. The soil ought to be a sandy loam, mixed with rotten leaves, or dung, so thoroughly decayed as to have become a kind of mold. Plant the bulb so shallow that nearly half of it shall remain out of the soil. When first planted they may be kept in a cool, dark place, until the buds have begun to move, when the pots may be taken to the windows of a warm room, and if the soil be watered with warmish water, they will grow so much the faster.

The preceding directions are mostly taken from Mrs. Loudon's "Gardening for Ladies," a valuable work that deserves an extensive circulation.

The Indian Country in Canada.

A correspondent of the Rochester American, from Brantford, Canada West, gives the following picture of life among the Mohawks in Canada:—

A few leisure moments enable me to send you a word of greeting from the Indian country upon Grand River. We came up here to spend a few days among the Mohawks, away from the perplexities of civilized life. At the commencement of the Revolution it is well known that this Nation abandoned their establishments upon the Mohawk, and retired to Canada. The British Government eventually assigned them a large and beautiful tract upon Grand River, where they have since resided, and from appearances have enjoyed a large degree of prosperity. At present they number about seven hundred. Soon after their establishment upon this river, they were joined by bands from Onondaga, and Cayuga, and also by large numbers of Tuscaroras, Senecas, and Oneidas. The settlement of Western New York pushed a tide of population upon the Indian Districts which the Iroquois Nations were unable to resist, and the largest part of each Nation, except the Seneca, emigrated to this country and to the West. There is now upon the Grand River a miniature representation of the Six Nations, still divided by boundary lines, preserving their national names and affinities, and many of their ancient customs. The Mohawks are upon the upper part of Grand River, near Brantford. Next below them are the Tuscaroras, numbering about three hundred, and next to them are the Onondagas, numbering about four hundred. Descending the river, you next enter the reserve of the Cayugas, who number about seven hundred. About two hundred Oneidas, Senecas, and Chippewas are settled among them, thus making the total Indian population upon the banks of this river about twenty-three hundred. The Oneidas removed to the River Thames, and to Green Bay.

The river, called Swargeh by the Iroquois, is a beautiful stream, a little larger than the Genesee. The soil is extremely fertile, yielding abundantly with careful tillage, and very respectably under Indian husbandry; and the general appearance of the country is very attractive. The Indians have no villages, but their habitations, which are principally upon the west side of the river, are scattered along the stream within six miles of the river, and from Brantford down for about twenty miles below. The Mohawks are mostly christianized, as also are the Tuscaroras, but the larger part of the Cayugas and Onondagas still adhere to their ancient faith. This portion of the Iroquois family are rapidly advancing in their social condition, if external appearances are to be trusted, and something highly creditable may be expected of them hereafter as a people. I should not omit to mention that a steamer plies up Grand River as far as Brantford.

Lead for Statuary Purposes.

An Edinburgh correspondent of the Athenæum very justly urges the advantages to be gained by the adoption of lead in statuary work, and instances the equestrian statue of Charles the Second, erected in Parliament Square by the magistrates of the city, in honor of the Restoration, and undoubtedly the finest piece of statuary in Edinburgh, as a fair example of the capabilities of the material. Many who hear of this proposal for the first time, will smile at the idea of applying so soft a material as lead for an office which bronze and granite usually fill, and indeed even many of the Edinburgh residents are ignorant of its successful employment in the work to which we have alluded. That it is really lead, has been ascertained beyond a doubt, as a few years ago the horse's shoulder sank, owing to the failure of one of the iron supports, when the statue was taken down, the sunk parts beaten out, and new supports put in, with a filling up composition, making it as good as ever. Seeing this acknowledged to be superior to any other bronze or marble statues which adorn the city—and Edinburgh possesses a goodly number, from the hands of the most eminent artists—it must be admitted that the qualifications of lead have been strangely overlooked by the modeler. As regards durability, King Charles has stood 165 years, and yet retains its original excellence.

Wrought-Iron Fences.

We saw yesterday, says the N. Y. Tribune, some fine specimens of Wire-Fence for Farms, constructed wholly of wrought-iron. The wires are stretched horizontally at regular distances apart, and supported at suitable intervals by iron posts of inch or inch-and-a-quarter iron. The wires are secured by bolts passing through an eye corresponding with holes drilled in the sides of the post. The supports are sunk in the ground to the depth of eighteen inches or two feet; carefully secured, and strengthened when necessary by iron braces. These fences can be made of any desired size, and are exceedingly neat and ornamental. They have already come into extensive use in England, and in other parts of Europe similar contrivances have met with universal favor. The aim of the manufacturer in this City, Mr. John B. Wickersham, is to effect their general introduction into the American market. The advantages claimed for this style of Fence have been fully sustained by frequent experiment, and will commend it to all who examine the mode of its construction. It is very portable, light, yet secure, ornamental, and, still better, is afforded at a remarkably moderate rate. The whole fence may be taken down and transported with the same facility and in the same manner as ordinary iron rods. Its price will range from $1 50 to $3 per rod; and when once constructed it remains good for any length of time. For the Southern country, where timber is scarce and fences necessary, or on the Prairies, there can be no better article than this. Rail-fences at best are awkward, troublesome, and unsightly, and where wood is a scarce and precious article, the Wrought-iron Fence must prove a welcome substitute.

The Extension of Slavery.

And there stands Slavery—never less ashamed than now—not couchant, but rampant—making her plans to live forever—boldly claiming to advance by equal steps with freedom—as if darkness were as good as light, and the devil had as fair a right to a lion's share as Messiah. Nor may you marvel, friends, if I, who was once noted here as the "apologist of Slavery," can now present myself its stern assailant. For its existence I did, and would, apologize; but never for its extension. I would deal gently with the hereditary sin of its being; but I abhor the stupendous volitional crime of its propogandism. And when I think what a scheme of continental enormity the Slave power is struggling to develop before us, my heart sickens with disgust and my soul is paralyzed with horror. The great market for human cattle, if the Slave power can succeed, is to be opened in the new States of the West, for which the supply is to be raised in the East. Our Atlantic States are to become the American Guinea. Old Virginia, the mother of Presidents, barren of tobacco and fecund of bipeds, has already gone to breeding babies for sale! Sweet Carolina is anxious to drive her children to the shambles. Asiatic Georgia has long been celebrated on the page of infamy, for selling her fair offspring to the harem; American Georgia is eager to outrival that shame, by selling her tawny daughters to the sugar field and the gold mine. When the trade of human cattle-breeding is fully established, and the East shall annually pour her myriads of yoked, scourged, and hand-cuffed live-stock, like a mighty gulf-stream to the West; the prohibition of the foreign Slave Trade will be a fine protective tariff for the encouragement of this domestic production. Then will come a grand slaveocratic millenium, in which the East will be the Slave-breeders, and the West will be the Slave-consumers; the South will be the Slave-holders, the North the Slave-catchers. We shall doubtless, then, preserve the "glorious Union!"—as glorious, forsooth, as the ropes and chains wherewith old Mezentius bound the living man to the rotting corpse. If these indications of depravity in the national heart were our only omens, or in themselves were irremovable, small would be the hope of regenerating the public conscience into life. Our history, too, must turn out disastrous failure. Then, wherever the star of hope should turn—whether tracing its steps back to wearied Christendom, or verging to our occident, should curve over the broad Pacific, until west became east, the prospect would be equally desperate, of renovating humanity on the shores of Europe, or the plains of Asia. Let these dark influences quench our lamp, and "I know not where is the Promethean fire that can that light reillumine."

Swallows.

A correspondent of the Evening Post says: "Some months ago there appeared in your paper two or three communications upon the subject of swallows disappearing under the water on the approach of cold weather; and lately meeting the following extract in the course of my writings, it occurred to me to send it to you. It is from the writings of Huet, a French author, who died in 1721. He also mentions an odd fact which may be unknown to you, for the truth of which, however, I am not prepared to hold myself responsible:—

"'Swallows in Sweden, at the approach of cold weather, plunge into the lakes and remain there asleep and buried under the ice till the return of Spring. Then, awakened by the returning heat, they leave the water and resume their usual flight. While the lakes are frozen, if the ice be broken in certain places, which appear darker than others, the swallows are found in great quantities, cold, asleep, and half dead. If they are taken out and warmed by the hands, or before the fire, they soon begin to exhibit signs of life; they stretch themselves out, shake themselves, and soon fly away. In other places they retire into the caves and under the rocks. Between the town of Caen and the sea, along the banks of the Orne, there are many of these caverns, where, during the winter, clusters of swallows have been found suspended, like bunches of grapes from the roof of the cavern. The same thing has been long ago observed in Italy.'"

Ship Building in Oregon.

From a private letter, received at this office, under date of "Milwaukie, Oregon, Oct. 1," we learn that one of our New England ship and steamboat builders, Mr. Wm. L. Hascom, who, within a few years past, has built several fine steamboats and ships in Newburyport, this State, and Portsmouth, N. H., is now constructing a steamboat, 160 feet long, 24 feet wide, and 6½ feet deep, in Oregon, for Lott, Whitcomb & Co., to run on the Columbia River. The ship-yard is established on the Willamett River, at Milwaukie, a small, but enterprising and rapidly growing town at the head of ship navigation on that river, and eight miles from Oregon City. The facilities for ship-building at Milwaukie are considered equal, if not superior, to those of any port in the United States. The keel of the steamer now building there is all in one piece. The tree from which it was taken was cut within a few rods of the yard, and measured 124 feet to the first limb, and at 155 feet 8 inches it was cut off, and hewn out 9 by 14 inches. There are two saw-mills adjoining the ship-yard, constantly employed in getting out timber for the ship-builders. The land at Milwaukie, and in its vicinity, is excellent, as may be seen by the heavy growth of pine, fir, oak, cedar, and hemlock timber, standing thereon. The climate is delightful, being, for the most of the time, like our "Indian Summer."

Oregon is fast becoming populated with a hardy, active, and enterprising people, who will ere long supply California, and most of the inhabitants of the Pacific ocean, with ships and vegetable produce. Her timber land, fertile soil, and the character of her citizens, bespeak for her an enviable reputation among the civilized nations of the world.

A spoiled child is an unfortunate victim, who proves the weakness of his parents' judgment much more forcibly than the strength of their affection.

FITCH'S FIRST STEAMBOAT.—The model of the first steamboat (built by John Fitch) was discovered, a few days ago, in the garret of the late residence of Col. Kilbourne, a brother-in-law of John Fitch, near the town of Columbus, in Ohio. It is thus described in a letter to the Cincinnati Commercial:—

"It is about two feet long, and set upon wheels. The boiler is about a foot long, and eight inches in diameter, with a flue through it, not quite in the center, into which the fire appears to have been placed. The cylinder stands perpendicular, and the frame-work that supports it is not unlike that now used by some of the low pressure boats on Lake Erie. There is a paddle-wheel on each side, and, in fact, everything appears to be complete with the exception of a condenser and force-pump. The boiler is even supplied with a safety-valve, though part of it has been broken off."

THE GENEROUS BLACKSMITH.—Mr. Wilson passing late one evening by a blacksmith shop, and hearing the sound of the hammer much later than usual, stepped in to inquire the cause. The man told him that one of his neighbors had just been burned out, and had lost everything; and he had undertaken to work an hour earlier in the morning, and an hour later at night, to help him.

"This is kind in you," said Mr. Wilson; "for I suppose your neighbor will never be able to pay you again."

"I do not expect it," replied the blacksmith; "but if I were in his situation, and he in mine, I am sure he would do as much for me."

The next morning Mr. Wilson called and offered to lend the blacksmith fifty dollars without interest, so that he might be able to buy his iron cheaper. But the man refused to take it; yet told Mr. Wilson that if he would lend it to the man whose house was burned down, it would go far toward helping him rebuild his cottage. To this Mr. Wilson consented, and had the pleasure of making two men happy.

FALL MANAGEMENT OF BEES.—The months of October and November are the season when the state of the apiary will require particular attention. The hives should be examined, and those not containing honey enough for its occupants to sustain themselves during the winter, must be fed. An ordinary swarm of family bees will consume from fifteen to twenty pounds of honey, from October to May. If the winter be very mild, more than this quantity will be required, but not in an ordinary season. The apiarian should be able, from practice, to know at once, on raising his hives whether the above quantity exists in them or not. Hives that have been occupied several years will be as heavy without honey as those that have been used but one season with from five to ten pounds; therefore an allowance must be made for the weight of old combs and bee-bread.

THE MINISTER ONLY THE LEADER [illegible] PRAYER.—It is related of the late John Breckinridge, whilst Chaplain to Congress, that, observing that several members of that body kept their seats, and continued reading whilst he was offering prayer, he one morning arose in his place, and said, "Let us pray." Waiting some minutes for them to arise, he repeated the expression, "Let us pray," emphasizing, in his peculiar way, the word "us," and then added, "I did not say, 'Let me pray;' but, 'Let us pray'—all of us." The rebuke had its desired effect. All the members, from that time until the end of the session, invariably arose and stood in a respectful attitude, whilst he led in their morning devotions. The rebuke might, with great propriety, be administered to most of our congregations.

Variety.

The owner of a fine building was informed by his tenant that "mysterious knockings" had been heard on the premises, similar to those in Stratford and Rochester, and expressed much apparent alarm at the circumstance. "Very well," said the gentleman, "I'll put a stop to their spiritual operations, and the very next time you hear any mysterious knockings, consider it a notice to quit the premises! I want no tenants who entertain such company." It is unnecessary to say they have not since been heard.

Mr. Layard has made a discovery at Ninevah of the greatest interest. He has penetrated into a chamber which appears to be of the same class as the "Hall of Records," noticed be the prophet Ezra. In this chamber Mr. Layard found, in terra cotta tables, piled up from the floor to the ceiling, what are apparently the archives of the Assyrian Empire during a long historical succession.

The cause of the sudden deaths at Kalmazoo, a week or two ago, which was imputed to Cholera, is thus explained by the Chicago Journal. A bottle of corrosive sublimate was mistaken for vinegar, and mixed with the mustard. The number of deaths were thirteen, eight at Kalamazoo, two at Marshall, two at Grand River, and one at Mottville.

A mulatto man, named Gordon, died at Trenton, a few days since, from an excitement caused by apprehensions that he might be arrested under the Fugitive Slave Law. He was told that persons from the South were in town, in quest of fugitives, when he ran away to secrete himself, and died as he was running.

A Turin letter to the editor of the London Times says, "I am told that the great project of piercing the Mount Cenis for a monster tunnel has been abandoned, and that a new line, connecting Basle with the subsisting railroad from Genoa to Turin, is under consideration."

A housemaid, who was sent to call a gentleman to dinner, found him engaged in using his tooth-brush. "Well, is he coming?" said the lady of the house, as the servant returned. "Yes, ma'am, directly," was the reply, "he's just sharpening his teeth."

The year is divided into three terms:—

The first, of 14 weeks, begins Wednesday, August 21st, and ends Wednesday, November 27th.

The second, of 15 weeks, begins Monday, December 2d, and ends Friday, March 14th.

The third, of 14 weeks, begins Tuesday, March 18th, and ends Tuesday, June 24th.

Board of Instruction.

GURDON EVANS, A. M., President,
And Professor of Mathematics and Natural Science.

Other competent Teachers will be employed as occasion may demand.

TEACHERS' CLASSES will be formed, as usual, at the beginning of the Fall and middle of the Winter Terms, and continue seven weeks.

In the Common Branches, classes will be formed at the commencement of each term; but in the higher, the interest of the student, as well as the welfare of the Institution, demand that a more systematic course of study be pursued.

Classes will be formed in Latin, French, and German, at the commencement of the Fall Term; in Hebrew, Greek, and Spanish, at the commencement of the Winter Term, and continue through the course of study.

In Mathematics, Geometry is studied in the Fall, Trigonometry and Conic Sections in the Winter, and Astronomy, Surveying, Navigation, &c., in the Summer Term.

The course of instruction in Agriculture is thorougly scientific, embracing study and recitation in the best authors. Instruction is given in a well-furnished laboratory, in the analysis of soils, ashes of plants, manures, &c. and the modes of testing for their constituent elements. The attention of farmers who wish to give their sons a practical education is especially called to this department.

Board in private families, from $1 25 to $1 50. Many students board in clubs for 60 to 75 cents.

CHURCH ORGANIZATION AND DISCIPLINE.

There is always danger, in our zeal to flee from one error, of falling into another. And it appears to me that the Baptists, in their zeal to keep clear from the usurpations of Episcopacy, have fallen, in many instances, into the opposite extreme.

That rulers should be recognized in the organization of the Christian Church, is clearly seen on a careful examination of the sacred pages; and that these are not all of them ministers of the word, is equally apparent. Tim. 5: 17. "Let the elders that rule well be counted worthy of double honor, especially they who labor in the word and doctrine." Here it is clear that some were rulers who were not ministers of the word. And of Paul it is said, (Acts 20: 17,) "And from Miletus he sent to Ephesus and called the elders of the church." In verse 28th, he says, "Take heed therefore unto yourselves, and to all the flock over the which the Holy Ghost hath made you overseers." Here, again, is a plurality of overseers in one flock. The Hebrew church was required to submit to a plurality of rulers. Heb. 14: 17.—"Obey them that have the rule over you, and submit yourselves."

Now, the question will arise, Who are these rulers? We conclude that, inasmuch as no direction is to be found in the New Testament for appointing any other officers than minsters and deacons, they, and they only, are the ruling officers in the church. Elder is a common title for all the officers in the church; it sometimes includes old men in office, and sometimes simply old men, which is its literal signification. The terms bishop, overseer, and ruler, when applied to church officers, are interchangeable terms. "Bishop," says Mr. Cruden, "signifies, 1st, spiritual overseers, that have the charge of souls, to instruct and rule them by the word." But how should they rule? Certainly not as a court to try offenders; for no such directions are to be found in Scripture. This belongs exclusively to the church. See Matt. 18: 17—"If he refuse to hear them, tell it to the church; and if he refuse to hear the church, let him be unto thee as a heathen man and a publican." In an address to the church, Paul says, "Put away from among yourselves that wicked person." The Scriptures of the New Testament furnish no directions for any other tribunal.

We come very naturally to the conclusion, then, that the deacons are assistants to the ministry; and, jointly with them, overseers and spiritual rulers in the church—ruling by the authority of the Divine word—watching, like the officers of an army, to keep every one in his proper place. They should always be ready to give instruction and admonition, in wisdom and meekness, to such as need their official attention and care—always cherishing, in their own hearts, the spirit of fatherly kindness and affection, yet a spirit of uncompromising firmness against what is manifestly wrong. Deacons should be men of tried integrity; and there should be a sufficient number in the church to prevent the burden being too heavy on any one. The church at Jerusalem, it appears, had six; small churches can do with less. If any doubt whether the duties hereafter described as belonging to deacons, are really duties of office, let there be an act of the church enjoining it upon them to do these things; and then, I think, all doubt will be removed. The word deacon signifies servant; and as servants of the church, she has a right to point out their service in any thing proper to be done.

We are now prepared to consider the rules of discipline.

First, trespass not amounting to crime. Under this head we notice, first, trespass committed by one directly against another. In such case, the well-known rule in the 18th chapter of Matthew should be strictly and invariably observed. The first in labor must prove to the seconds in labor, that the offender is guilty, without which they can neither labor with the offender, nor be witnesses before the church, should it come there. The expression, "Take with thee one or two more, that in the mouth of two or three witnesses every word may be established," goes to show that the laborers are to be the witnesses before the church. At the same time, we do not question the right of the church to examine other witnesses if she choose to do so. If he who received the injury neglects to do his duty, and tells it abroad, as soon as it comes to the knowledge of any one of the deacons, he should labor with him for the neglect of so important a duty, and hold him to a confession of his fault, and to the duty still of laboring with the offender, and of trying to settle it between themselves. If such delinquent refuse to confess his fault and do his duty, the deacon should take the second and third steps, as directed above; and if he finally refuse to confess his fault and do his duty when it comes before the church, he must be excluded; and then, if a real cause of difficulty be found to exist in the first person so accused, let one of the deacons take the labor into his own hands, and follow out the same rules, as the case may require. A difficulty should never be divulged to any one until evidence can be produced, yet the sufferer should keep trying, by prayer and private labor, to get relief. It is sometimes the case, that the sufferer cannot see his way clear to bear the evil, and go to the communion with the offender. If he tell the church, there is something in his way so that he cannot bring it to light; and yet he lives up to his duty in other respects. The church should never proceed against such an one because he has a tender conscience. But it would be well for the church to fast and pray—every member praying for the Lord to convict the offender; and there ought to be faith enough in the church to prevail. See Matt. 18: 19, 20.

Under this general head, we notice all other trespasses, or minor faults, committed no more against one than another, or against them that are without. In these cases, some take the position, that as the trespass is against the church, or cause of religion in general, it is the duty of the church to take it up in the first place; and then a committee is appointed to perform the labor. But serious objections to this course may be raised. One of the first, which is sufficient of itself to condemn it, is, that there is no gospel rule for such a course. The second is, that evils in that way are left to grow without proper attention, till both the character and peace of the church are endangered, if not lost. For instance, one becomes loose in his habits in regard to the Sabbath, and another, a little too greedy of gain in his business transactions, is perhaps guilty of extortion. No one wishes to report such to the church for a small offense. The evil grows; and yet no one wishes to be the complainant before the church. Thus the character of the church is going down, and distrust and unkind feelings grow up among the members. At last, when Zion gets to bleeding at every pore, in the midst of disaffection and ill-feeling, some one calls upon the church to appoint a committee; and the committee goes. What! says the offender, who has entered a complaint against me to the church? Is there no one in the church who cares enough for my feelings and welfare to admonish me first before bringing my name upon the records of the church as an offender? Such member is generally lost; and with him goes much of the character and peace of the church.

Now, in all this class of evils, we find appropriate work for the officers of the church. The pastor should give his timely admonitions and instructions, both publicly and privately; and the deacons should be in their place, always ready to urge the claims of the word on the mind of the delinquent. In most cases, this course will secure the end desired. But, when the nature of the case demands it, one of the deacons should take the first and second steps before it comes to the church.

In the second place, we consider what comes under the head of crime, or vile character established. The lower class of vile characters are brought to view in the 5th chapter of 1st Corinthians. Of course, the higher crimes can meet with no greater favor than these. Verse 11—"But now I have written unto you not to keep company, if any man that is called a brother be a fornicator, or covetous, or an idolater, or a railer, or a drunkard, or an extortioner; with such an one no not to eat." Here it must be observed, that the address is to the church; and no one can eat with the church in any other way than in the communion. Now, if the officers of the church do their duty, such a character will seldom be formed among the members. But, when such a character is formed, or the higher crime committed, the church must not eat, that is, not travel with such. What, then, must be done? Verse 13th says, "Therefore put away from among yourselves that wicked person." There is no proviso in the case. Confession or no confession, such a vile person must be put away. But the proof of his guilt must be presented to the church. Here again is business for the deacons; though no other labor is required but to collect and present the evidence to the church. But in case of evil reports, charging a member of the church with such crime or vile character, the deacons should inquire into it, and if sufficient evidence cannot be found, they are then prepared to stand up in defense of assailed innocence, and call upon accusers to produce evidence or desist from accusing. Though such cannot be saved from exclusion, yet, when they redeem their characters in the eyes of the church and the enlightened public, they may be restored. Paul again addresses the Corinthian church, no doubt in relation to the same fornicator, (2 Cor. 2: 7) and says, "Sufficient to such a man is this punishment, which was inflicted of many; so that, contrariwise, ye ought rather to forgive him, and comfort him, lest perhaps such an one should be swallowed up with overmuch sorrow." See also the context.

In the third place, we notice heresy. Mr. Cruden says, the word signifies a sect or choice. Others say that it means opinions. Though private opinions may exist to almost an unlimited extent in regard to things which do not result in a diversity of practice, and be borne with in the church, yet subversive opinions, acted upon, cannot. He, therefore, who sets up his opinions, and endeavors to draw off a party, or acts himself on opinions which lead him into a course of practice contrary to the gospel rules of faith and order, renders himself, in the Bible sense, a heretic. If the pastor and deacons have been in their places, all reasonable and hopeful efforts have been made to save him from becoming a heretic. But when he is such, let the deacons present the case and the evidence to the church; then the rule is plain. Tit. 3: 10, 11—"A man that is a heretic, after the first and second admonition reject; knowing that he that is such is subverted, and sinneth, being condemned of himself."

In the fourth and last place, we notice the case of wrong committed before the church assembled. 1st. Tim. 5: 20—"Them that sin, rebuke before all, that others also may fear." We conclude, this rule can refer to no other sin than that before the church; for the foregoing rules will meet every other case, and this rule would be inconsistent with other rules if applied in any other case. This rebuke, it appears, is to be given by the pastor or presiding officer; and the church, of course, must sustain him in so doing, if the cause is just; but if the church decide that the act is not wrong, he must withdraw his rebuke, and be in subjection to the church. But when the sin is committed and the rebuke given, the church should hold the offender to such confession or submission as the nature of the case shall demand.

From a consideration of what is said in Scripture of the necessary qualifications of deacons' wives, and in view of the fact that in many cases of instruction and labor among the sisters their assistance is indispensable, we conclude that they should be expected to be ready to assist the deacons in any of their labors, where their assistance is needed.

The foregoing views of discipline, it is true, make the duties of deacons very responsible and laborious; and, as a matter of common honesty, they should be rewarded by the church for the time they spend in her service. They can keep an account of the time they spend, and it can be arranged, between them and the church, as they can agree.

No person who brings a complaint to the church, in good faith, and fails to prove his charges, should be held to any other confession than to be in submission to the decision of the church.

Letters of excommunication are without precedent or precept in Scripture; and as their tendency is generally to evil, they never should be given.

The pastor, when present, should preside in meetings of the church, except in case of difficulty where he is personally concerned; then the senior deacon present, who is not thus disqualified, should preside, which will make the church always an organized body.

The pastor and deacons should have frequent interviews for mutual instruction and consultation, and should have an understanding among themselves which part of the labor each one shall perform, especially when there is much to be done. In these interviews, there should always be seasons of fervent prayer.

Now, we venture the opinon, that a case requiring discipline can scarcely arise, which the above rules will not meet, except where disorder reigns in consequence of having pursued an improper course, which has ended in confusion rather than peace and purity; and then the most judicious course, generally, is to confess and begin anew, with such as can be in fellowship, and see that the organization of the church is perfected, and that the officers and members understand what is to be done to preserve order and peace. These rules, in general, the writer has seen proved for many years, and union, peace, and prosperity to the church, have been the result. Very few cases of discipline ever come before the church; and when they do come, they are so prepared that little time and labor are generally required, and an immense amount of pain and agitation on the part of the feebler members of the church are saved. Fully believing these to be the true Bible views of the subject, he humbly submits them, for the consideration of the Christian public, and for the consideration of Seventh-day Baptists in particular. "If ye know these things, happy are ye if ye do them."

ELIAS BURDICK.

PRESTON, N. Y., Nov. 19th, 1850.

SEED SOWN AT A VENTURE.

In June last a fisherman sailed from Gloucester, Mass. Upon opening a package which he had brought from home, his eye fell upon an article in a religious newspaper. He was a young man. He had been careless, even reckless, as to future realities. But he was to be made the subject of sovereign grace. The time had come. That paragraph was the Spirit's chosen instrument. He continued to read the paper, notwithstanding the remonstrances of his shipmates. He was led to see his guilt, his helplessness, his need, and in not many weeks was rejoicing in Christ's merits and death. He is now on his way to a glorious immortality.

The paper was the Watchman and Reflector. Neither the number nor the paragraph are known. No special petition may have been been put up to the throne of grace by the editor, as he penned or selected that paragraph. The paper was placed in that box by a pious mother. The failure of so many influences, from infancy to manhood, would have made others despair. To others this may have seemed "a folorn hope." But she was full of faith. She now rejoices. She had become, through the solicitations of an agent, a recent subscriber to the paper, and at the request of her son subsequently ordered it stopped. God was pleased to bless an intervening number, and a soul has been saved. That number was to make known God's power and grace to a prodigal son—to give joy in heaven and upon earth, and to encourage the Christian editor to see and to feel his instrumentality in the accomplishment of God's purposes. "My word shall not return unto me void."

Only, only, only Thee!

Since the day I called Thee "mine,"
Since the answer, "I am thine,"
Sweetly have I walked between
Waters still and pastures green;
Soft thine hand upon my brow—
I, the sheep—the Shepherd, Thou!

Oft with Thee communion sweet
Have I known where Christians meet;
Sweeter yet, when at the board
Of my dying, risen Lord!
There my head was on Thy breast,
There my weary soul at rest!

Once again beside the cross,
All my gain I count but loss;
Earthly pleasures fade away,
Clouds they are, that hide my day.
Hence, vain shadows! Let me see
Jesus crucified for me!

From beneath that thorny crown,
Trickle drops of cleansing down;
Pardon from thy pierced hand,
Now I take while here I stand.
Only then I live to Thee,
When thy wounded side I see.

Blessed Saviour, Thine am I;
Thine to live, and thine to die;
Height, or depth, or creature power
Ne'er shall hide my Saviour more;
Ever shall my idol be,
Only, only, only Thee!

MARY WASHINGTON.

BY MRS. ELLET.

The only memoir of the mother of Washington extant is the one written by George W. P. Custis, the grandson of Martha Washington, and published more than twenty years ago in his "Recollections" in the National Gazette. These reminiscences were collected by him in the course of many years; and to them we are indebted for all that is known of the life and actions of this matron. According to these, she was descended from the respectable family of Ball, who came to this country and settled on the banks of the Potomac. In the old days of Virginia, women were taught habits of industry and self-reliance, and in these Mrs. Washington was nurtured. The early death of her husband involved her in the cares of a young family, with limited resources, which rendered prudence and economy necessary to provide for and educate her children. Thus circumstanced, it was left to her unassisted efforts to form in her son's mind those essential qualities which gave tone and character to his subsequent life. George was only twelve years old at his father's death, and retained merely the remembrance of his person, and his parental fondness. Two years after this he obtained a midshipman's warrant, but his mother opposed the plan, and the idea of entering the naval service was relinquished.

One of the associates of his juvenile years, Lawrence Washington, of Chotank, thus speaks of the home of Washington:—

"I was often there with George, his playmate, schoolmate, and young man's companion. Of the mother I was ten times more afraid than I ever was of my own parents; she awed me in the midst of her kindness, for she was truly kind; and even now, when time has whitened my locks, and I am the grand-parent of a second generation, I could not behold the majestic woman without feelings it is impossible to describe. Whoever has seen the awe-inspiring air and manner so characteristic of the Father of his country, will remember the matron as she appeared, the presiding genius of her well-ordered household, commanding and being obeyed."

Educated under such influences, it is not to be wondered at that Washington's deportment towards his mother at all times testified his appreciation of her elevated character, and the excellence of her lessons.

"On his appointment to the command-in-chief of the American armies," says Mr. Custis, "previously to his joining the forces at Cambridge, he removed his mother from her residence to the village of Fredericksburg, a situation remote from all danger, and contiguous to her friends and relatives. There she remained during nearly the whole of the trying period of the Revolution."

When news arrived of the passage of the Delaware, in December, 1776, the mother received calmly the patriots who came with congratulations; and while expressing pleasure at the intelligence, disclaimed for her son the praises in the letters from which extracts were read. When informed by express of the surrender of Cornwallis, she lifted her hands in gratitude towards heaven, and exclaimed, "Thank God! war will now be ended, and peace, independence, and happiness bless our country."

Her housewifery, industry, and care in the management of her domestic concerns, were not intermitted during the war. "She looketh well to the ways of her household, and worketh willingly with her hands," said the wise man, in describing a virtuous woman; and it was the pride of the exemplary women of that day, to fill the station of mistress with usefulness as well as dignity. Mrs. Washington was remarkable for a simplicity which modern refinement might call servile, but which became her not less when her fortunes were clouded, than when the sun of glory arose upon her house. Some of the aged inhabitants of Fredericksburg long remembered the matron, as, "seated in an old-fashioned open chaise, she was in the habit of visiting almost daily her little farm in the vicinity of the town. When there, she would ride about her fields, giving her orders, and seeing that they were obeyed." When on one occasion an agent departed from his instructions, she reproved him for exercising his own judgment in the matter: "I command you," she said; "there is nothing left for you but to obey."

Her charity to the poor was well known; and having no wealth to distribute, it was necessary that what her benevolence dispensed, should be supplied by domestic economy and industry. How peculiar a grace does this impart to the benefits flowing from a sympathizing heart!

It is thus she has been pictured in the imagination of one of our most gifted poets:—

"Methinks we see thee as in olden time,
Simple in garb, majestic and serene—
Unawed by 'pomp and circumstance'—in truth
Inflexible—and with Spartan zeal
Repressing vice, and making folly grave.
Thou didst not deem it woman's part to waste
Life in inglorious sloth, to waste awhile
Amid the flowers, or on the summer wave,
Then fleet like the ephemeron away,
Building no temple in her children's hearts,
Save to the vanity and pride of life,
Which she had worshiped."

Mr. Custis states that she was continually visited and solaced, in the retirement of her declining years, by her children and numerous grandchildren. Her daughter, Mrs. Lewis, repeatedly and earnestly requested her to remove to her house, and pass the remainder of her days. Her son pressingly entreated her that she should make Mount Vernon the home of her age. But the matron's answer was, "I thank you for your affectionate and dutiful offers, but my wants are few in this world, and I feel perfectly competent to take care of myself." To the proposition of her son-in-law, Col. Lewis, to relieve her by taking the direction of her concerns, she replied: "Do you, Fielding, keep my books in order, for your eyesight is better than mine; but leave the executive management to me." Such was the energy and the independence she preserved to an age beyond that usually allotted to mortals, until within three years of her death, when the disease under which she suffered (cancer of the breast) prevented exertion.

Her meeting with Washington, after the victory which decided the fortune of America, illustrates her character too strikingly to be omitted. After an absence of nearly seven years, she was, at length, on the return of the combined armies from Yorktown, permitted again to see and embrace her illustrious son.

"The lady was alone—her aged hands employed in works of domestic industry—when the good news was announced; and it was further told that the victorious chief was in waiting at the threshold. She welcomed him with a warm embrace, and by the well-endearing names of his childhood. Inquiring as to his health, she remarked the lines which mighty cares and many trials had furrowed, spoke much of old times and old friends; but of his glory not one word!"

The Marquis de la Fayette repaired to Fredericksburg, previous to his departure for Europe, in the fall of 1784, to pay his parting respects to the mother, and to ask her blessing. Conducted by one of her grandsons, he approached the house, when the young gentleman observed: "There, sir, is my grandmother." La Fayette beheld—working in the garden, clad in the domestic made clothes, and her grey head covered with a plain straw hat—the mother of "his hero, his friend, and a country's preserver!" "Ah, Marquis! you see an old woman; but come, I can make you welcome to my poor dwelling, without the parade of changing my dress."

To the encomiums lavished by the Marquis on his chief, the mother replied: "I am not surprised at what George has done, for he was always a very good boy."

The person of Mrs. Washington is described as being of medium height, and well proportioned; her features pleasing, though strongly marked. There were few painters in the colonies in those days, and no portrait of her is in existence.

Mrs. Washington died at the age of eighty-five, rejoicing in the consciousness of a life well spent, and the hope of a blissful immortality. Her ashes repose at Fredericksburg, where a splendid monument has been erected to her memory.

VICTORY OVER DEATH.

Mr. Van Lennep, while at Smyrna, on his way from this country to Constantinople, visited a dear friend of his, Baron Megredich, who was for many years employed by the mission as a translator, and who experienced a change of heart while living with Mr. Van Lennep. He gives the following account of the interview:—

"He was lying very low with consumption, and was about to be carried to Constantinople, to which place the family were removing. We had a delightful season together, talking of our past intercourse and of the glorious world into which he expected very soon to be ushered. He said, with a smile, 'I was born in Constantinople, and I am going there to die.' I asked, 'Do you have any fears that when you die Christ will not receive you?' He answered, 'I did have some; but it came from distrusting his word, because he has promised to receive the vilest sinner; but now I thank him that he makes me very happy, and removes every fear and doubt from my mind.' I asked, 'Are you sorry for the sacrifices you have made for him, and the efforts you have made to serve him?' The tears filled his eyes, his lips quivered, and for a few minutes he could not speak. After composing himself a little, he said, 'This is my great and heavy sorrow, that I have done nothing for him. I am wholly an unprofitable servant, and my only hope is in his infinite mercy and grace.' While conversing with this young man, it seemed as though he was surrounded by a heavenly atmosphere; and as I went away, I was saying to myself: 'This dear brother will very soon see face to face, and be ushered into the immediate presence of his glorious Saviour; he will in a few days join the noble company who have been gathered from his own nation, and out of every tribe and language and tongue, while we are yet struggling, and toiling, and fainting here below. Well, let us struggle on. Our reward is this, that we may send to heaven from time to time just such spirits as this, who have been redeemed from the degrading superstitions of a Christianity which deserves not the name.'"

A COLPORTEUR IN FRANCE.

Evil must fall upon those governments who make sport with the sacred feelings of right and liberty; for all men cannot bear it as patiently as one of our brethren, a colporteur, did, a few days ago. He was offering his Bibles for sale at a liquor-shop in one of the streets of Paris, and selecting a tract to give to an infidel present, when two police officers, who had been following him for some time, asked for tracts; he gave them some with all simplicity, but, when he had finished his conversation, and had turned to go, he was summarily arrested, and without a question being asked, marched off to the guard-house like a felon, placed in the hands of gens-d'arms, while an agent eagerly ran to inform the commissary of his capture. While sitting in custody, our brother quietly remarked,

"Is it not rather extraordinary that a peaceful citizen can be arrested in this manner, when he is furnished with all the certificates required by law?"

"How," cried the brigadier, "have you any certificates?"

"Undoubtedly; here they are!"

The brigadier seized them, and casting his eye over them—"Here! run quick!" shouted he, "run some one to the commissary! overtake the agent before he makes his report!" and a man ran directly, but it was too late; the agent was returning, and, with rather a rueful face, said to the colporteur,

"Of course you have no papers?"

"I have, indeed," was the reply, "and they are being examined."

"Why did you not tell us that at first?"

"You asked me no question; I merely had to obey your order."

"Mille excuses Monsieur; then you are free."

Our friend told them he hoped that his case would be the last of the kind; and then, choosing some appropriate tracts, offered one to each of the men, begging them to read them attentively, and leave them at the guard-house for their comrades who should relieve guard. After a little explanation he had the pleasure of seeing them accept the books and begin to peruse them, and the next day, as he passed down the same street, he saw some other police agents engaged in reading them. On his discharge the people in the street closed round him to congratulate him on his liberation, and asked him what had passed in the guard-house, thus giving him an excellent opportunity of speaking of the Word of God, which he gratefully improved, and found an entrance to several families whose doors would otherwise have been shut against him. Thus God brings good out of evil. [Lon. Ch. Times.

ANOTHER FRENCH INCIDENT.

The New York Chronicle publishes the following extract of a letter, dated

LYONS, Oct. 15, 1850.

On Sunday last we had quite a fracas at our quiet little chapel. During the first prayer, a party of nine or ten gentlemanly dressed men entered, and immediately after prayer one of them arose and inveighed against the introduction of a new religion, in strong terms. Dr. Devan dispatched some one for the police officer of the district, and then answered him solemnly and earnestly, telling him that the place was not one for discussion, but for preaching the gospel, and the necessity of that faith, without which it was impossible to be saved. By this time the police officer entered, and immediately took sides with the party, who it appears came there by his express permission. He declared the meeting illegal, ordered the people to disperse, and the doors to be closed. There was no resisting such authority, and so the poor frightened sheep dispersed, trembling for the safety of the under shepherd.

The outside signs were then torn down, and one old man turned upon his steps several times to say—"Shame, shame to you, Frenchmen! to come here listening to a stranger—a foreigner—an American." "Sir," replied one of our dauntless sisters, "Stranger or not, he preaches to us Christ; and when you do the same we will listen to you." So you see, that to be a foreigner is, in the eyes of this people, an intolerable crime. Can any good come out of Nazareth?

Yesterday (Monday) Dr. Devan took his "Authorization" to this same police officer, and showed him that all he has done has been legal and just. The officer on seeing his papers acknowledged the fact, and said that henceforward we were at liberty to proceed—perhaps so—we'll see.

TRAINING FOR SERVICE.

It is no uncommon thing for those who are to be employed in great and important services in the cause of God and truth to be themselves the subjects of fiery trial, that they may be more fitted for their work. Luther, at a certain time, was violently harassed and afflicted with temptation; insomuch that his heart was rent with anguish, and tears streamed from his eyes, and his breath was spent in sighing. Amid these pangs of distress, a person accosted him with the following words: "My son, why dost thou mourn? Dost thou not know that God hath commanded thee to believe?" "When I heard that word command," says the zealous reformer, "it prevailed more on my heart than all that I heard or read, or thought on before." He acknowledged that he did not understand some scriptures till he was in affliction; and that he was never employed in any new thing, but that he was beset with some temptation, or visited with a fit of sickness.

Those are mistaken who imagine that indulgence is the way to make children happy, and that restraint will only tend to damp the volatile spirits of childhood, or destroy the natural energy of character incidental to the youthful mind.

THE FUGITIVE SLAVE LAW.

The general desire to know what can be said in favor of and against the Fugitive Slave Law, has induced us to give free scope to our correspondents, and to admit the communications of nearly every class, from the most ultra to the most conservative. Having given a hearing to all sides, and so furnished our readers with every needful help to judge of the merits or demerits of the Law, we hope to be excused for omitting some articles which, though well conceived and well written, are still, to a considerable extent, repetitions of what has already been said.

If we mistake not, those who apologize for the Law and those who denounce it, agree that it is exceedingly severe and summary in its provisions, and repugnant to the better feelings of right-minded and kind-hearted men. This feature of it, will doubtless prevent its ever being used extensively to promote the object for which it was framed. Indeed, whether it was designed as a quietus to slavery agitation, or as an instrument of reclaiming fugitives, its impotency has already been demonstrated. There has probably never been a time when the slavery agitation was more general, and the hostility to slavery more determined, than since the adoption of the Law. And as to reclaiming fugitives, the fact that not fifty have been reclaimed, out of the fifty thousand who are supposed to be residing in the Free States, shows that the chances are no better with the Law than they were without it.

In regard to the constitutionality of the Law, that is a question for the decision of which there is a proper tribunal; and we fear that a newspaper discussion of it, without any design of referring to such tribunal, would prove profitless, as it might prove endless. There is but little reason to doubt, that the clause of the Constitution which provides for the delivering up of persons held to service in one State, who have fled into another State, was designed to facilitate the reclamation of fugitives from slavery. But whether that clause would justify the summary process set forth in the Fugitive Slave Law, is certainly questionable. To be consistent with the general spirit of the Constitution, the Law ought, at least, to provide for a fair trial and just decision of the alledged fugitive's claim to freedom in the vicinity where he is arrested; instead of which, it allows him to be removed into a distant State, where it is next to impossible, if he be a freeman, to obtain the necessary testimony to prove it, and where, even if the testimony of his colored associates could be obtained, it would have no weight against that of white men. Again, the Law ought to leave the slaveholder to identify and recover his slave property just as he would recover any other property—a runaway horse, for instance—by the aid of the ordinary officers of justice, and at his own expense; but, instead of this, it provides a special set of officers, and saddles the expense upon the national treasury. Then think of that section of the Law giving to the United States Commissioner $10 for convicting and only $5 for releasing the fugitive—a five-dollar bribe in favor of the slaveholder and against the slave. To all which add the denial of the right of trial by jury and the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus; and who can wonder that the question of the constitutionality of the Law is raised, and that those who suppose the Constitution should be interpreted consistently with its Preamble, take sides against the Law?

UNIVERSITY AT CLEVELAND.

Pres. Mahan and Secretary Slade have published a circular in relation to the prospects of the proposed University at Cleveland. A tract of 275 acres of land, beautifully and eligibly situated, within about one mile of the center of the city, has been purchased for the sum of a$34,000. It is thought that after some 50 or 75 acres shall have been set apart for the location of the University buildings, and for manual labor purposes, the remainder may be sold in city lots, so as to realize a sum as high as from $120,000 to $150,000 for the endowment of Professorships, to which purpose it has been set apart.

The plan of education is the following: Courses of instruction of an ample character in all the great branches of education are to be adopted. At the head of each course an able professor will be placed, whose duty it shall be to perfect the students entering his particular department in all the branches pertaining to it. In all these courses, as far as may be, popular lectures are to be delivered, of which not only the students but multitudes in the community may profitably avail themselves. When the student has really and truly mastered a sufficient number of these courses to entitle him to the usual degrees, he will receive them. Otherwise he will receive a certificate of attainments actually made. It is a fundamental design of the Institution to keep the student, in all stages of his education, under the full influence of that "dearest of books, that excels every other." Successful efforts have been made and are in further prosecution for the selection and appointment of an able and competent board of instruction, a board selected without reference to sectarian peculiarities, but characterized by ripe scholarship, enlarged, liberal and evangelical views and principles, and who are in full sympathy with the plan and objects of the institution.

SUNDAY-KEEPING IN PHILADELPHIA.

Mayor Gilpin, of Philadelphia, has for weeks past held court on Sunday morning, to dispose of such cases as originated during the previous night. The ground on which his friends attempt to justify him is, that he is engaged in a work of necessity and mercy. This plea, however, does not satisfy all. Hence some pretty sharp reviews through the newspapers. A correspondent of the Public Ledger says that "the Mayor himself is guilty of a misdemeanor, and might be arraigned, convicted and fined"—a truth, unquestionably, and one which shows the character of Sunday Laws generally, as instruments which can be used to arraign, convict and fine men, not only for acting conscientiously, as in the case of the Pennsylvania Sabbath-keepers, but for doing what they consider to be works of necessity and mercy, as in the case of the Mayor of Philadelphia. The writer in question concludes his notice of the Mayor's course, by saying, "It is a palpable violation of God's command, Remember the Sabbath-day to keep it holy"—an assertion which is much easier made than proved. What a pity that people whose consciences are so tender on the subject of the Sabbath, should not show some tenderness in regard to other important points. In the same code which commands the keeping of the Sabbath, our Bible also forbids bearing false witness.

BRITISH CORRESPONDENCE—No. 21.

Glasgow, November 15th, 1850.

The Pope's audacity continues to be the principal theme with which this country is occupied. Lord John Russell has acquired immense popularity by the decided expression of indignation to which he so early gave utterance. The Court of Common Council in London, by acclamation, awarded him thanks for the stand which he thus makes against Papal aggression. His Lordship can scarcely avoid doing something, after having spoken so decidedly. And as his letter makes very special allusion to the tractarian clergy, who have so sedulously been leading their flocks back into the arms of the Romish Church, it was to be expected that some farther movement would be made in that direction. Accordingly, the telegraphic announcements of this morning include an intimation from the Morning Advertiser, that Government has hinted to certain of the Bishops of the Church of England, the necessity of their taking measures to free the Church of the Romanizing clergymen. If such hint has been given, and this is probable, it will doubtless restrain the more obvious sympathizing in external rituals with that apostacy; for the Bishops know how much they are in the hands of Government, while the universal expression of opinion, on this occasion, has shown to them how fully Government would be sustained, should they adopt even the most extreme measures for that purpose. We expect, therefore, that even the Bishop of Exeter will be taught moderation. Already, indeed, after his own fashion, he has denounced the Pope's interference with his dignity. The Bishop of Oxford, in less haste, has called a meeting of the clergy of his diocese, to take place a week hence, "for the purpose of protesting against the pretended partitioning of England into dioceses, by the Bishop of Rome." This, indeed, is the point insisted upon, as giving ground of offense to all the Bishops and clergy who have spoken out upon the occasion. It is indignation at the attempt to steal half the honors they now exclusively enjoy. The Bishops of Oxford and Exeter were zealous coadjutors with the Pope, or assistants to him; and other Bishops would have stood quietly by, had Rome been content to send only myriads of Jesuitical wolves, without a name, amongst the flocks of their respective dioceses; but it is not to be borne that by the multiplication of Bishoprics, they should be shorn of half their dignity.

The 5th of November, the anniversary of the Gunpowder Plot, which had been almost forgotten amongst us, followed, rather inopportunely, the disclosure of Papal designs; and the day was made the occasion of a great outburst of Anti-Papal feeling. Guy Faux of olden time was replaced by the effigy of his mistermed "Holiness," placed upon donkeys, and in other situations of indignity, and afterwards consigned to the flames. Attendant Cardinals and Bishops, in these pageants, shared the honors conferred upon their master. No man would like to be spit upon, even in effigy; and these pseudo-Bishops, in charges and addresses, have been taking their revenge by denouncing, as "insane folly," England's expressed hatred of Papal usurpation. Wiseman, the Cardinal, who arrived in London unexpectedly, in the beginning of the week, is said to be writing a pamphlet which will contain disclosures unfavorable to the fame of the Premier. He is stated to have expressed great surprise at his Lordship's letter—no preintimation having been given him of opposition to the Papal measure. The exulting tone which the newly-made dignitaries at first assumed, has been meanwhile suppressed, and is shown to have been premature. So long as we were regarded at Rome as "infidels," we were quiet; but, when treated as children, we manifest rebellion. Newman declared, in regard to the event, that "Christ is coming out of His grave." It was a revolting impiety; but this he may not be able to comprehend, when yet he may feel how awkward it is to have it seem that the glory is despised.

The whole we regard with pain chiefly as indicative of the progress Popery had already made amongst us, both under its own name and that of the Church of England. It is stated, that at the beginning of the present year, the number of Popish Chapels in England was 587; and, in Scotland, 93. The number of priests in England was 788; and, in Scotland, 110. The number of Colleges in England was 10; and, in Scotland, 1. The number of Convents and Religious Houses for men in England was 51; and, in Scotland, 11. The Government has largely endowed the Irish College of Maynooth, in Ireland, for the training exclusively of the Popish priesthood, and in official documents they have given the assumed titles to their dignitaries—not excepting that of the notorious "Archbishop of Tuam"—and this in the face of a law which makes criminal the use of such a title. The Pope has, therefore, reason to be surprised, as well as annoyed, at the turn which the affair has now taken, when he has been simply progressing in a path he had previously taken. But his expectations have been high, that the time had really come for a wide extension of his power. Others seem to have thought so too; for this week an assignment of 21,000 crucifixes, some thousands of images of the Virgin, &c., have arrived in London from France. The event will not be lost, if it lead the Church to a more true and perfect hatred of all Popery. Of this we see not yet much indication. Our vocation is to seek to promote such feeling in ourselves and others. May God give us all grace so to labor and to live as will best secure this result.

THE FUGITIVE SLAVE LAW.

Were a stranger, ignorant of all previously existing circumstances, to peruse the philippics which the Fugitive Slave Law has called forth, he would be led to inquire what new, hideous and unparalleled act of aggression against the Ethiopian race had been perpetrated?—of what legitimate and guarantied rights they had been suddenly deprived?—whether they were to be expatriated, or exterminated by the sword? He would also be led to suppose, from the language and comparisons continually employed, that some of our people, at least, were more intimately acquainted with the statutes of Russian and Algerine despotism, than they were with the rules of logic, or the respect that is always due to constituted authorities.

And what, after all, is the design of this Act, which has aroused every anarchist, fanatic and theorist of the North?—which affords such ample materials for all that class of writers, who are ever ready to find fault and discover blemishes, but who seem to forget that it is the part of the physician to prescribe the remedy as well as describe the disease? For what open and avowed purpose was it formed?—to betray freemen into thraldom and slavery, or to interpose any barrier in the way of lawful emancipation? No! no! Our legislators, impressed with a sense of the great necessity of union, conciliation and compromise, deemed it expedient to enact a law whereby persons held to servitude in one State, and thence escaping into another, might, with more certainty, be restored to those to whom their service was due. It is the misfortune of all law, that its operation sometimes oppresses the innocent; but who shall rise up and say that for this reason it should all be abolished? Who shall say, that all penal enactments for crimes against life and property should be repealed, because, in consequence of the unfortunate concurrence of circumstances, the guiltless have been doomed to feel their rigors? It is possible—it is even probable—that under the operation of the Fugitive Slave Law, some freemen may be exposed to the risk of being carried into servitude. Nevertheless, unless it can be proved that such is an unavoidable consequence, and that it was framed with the design to produce that result, I confess my inability to discover the validity of an objection predicated upon that foundation.

There is great inconsistency in the manner in which the before-mentioned writers panegyrize the Constitution of the United States, while pouring out their invectives against this Act, which, so far as the condition of the slave is concerned, contains nothing at variance with that instrument. Does not the Constitution, in Section 2d of Article 4th, expressly declare that a person held to service or labor in one State, under the laws thereof, escaping into another, shall be delivered up on claim of the party to whom such service or labor may be due? Can we for one moment suppose that men possessing such profound sagacity and far-reaching foresight as the founders of our government certainly did, could, in admitting that clause in the Constitution, have entertained the supposition that it would remain a dead letter, without any practical bearing upon the acts of future legislators? Indeed, the very language employed in that clause is significant of the fact, that the framers of the Constitution designed that their successors should thereby be endowed with full power and liberty to pass such enactments with reference to the escape of fugitives as the circumstances of future times might render expedient. The Constitution declares, that such persons shall be delivered upon the claim of the party to whom their service is due; but it does not specify to whom, or in what manner, the claim is to be made; by whom or by what process such delivery is to be effected; or what proof would be requisite. And why? Because such incidental circumstances could best be determined at a future period. The condition of the slave is a perfect anomaly, to which not a syllable of the Constitution, except that one sentence, is applicable. In Article 5th of the Amendments, we are told that no person shall be deprived of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law. This expression, however, cannot possibly interfere with the constitutionality of the Fugitive Slave Law; because it is impossible to deprive a person of what he never possessed; and as the slave was never possessed of legitimate liberty or property, he cannot be deprived of it. But were this otherwise, the expression "due process of law," means simply according to law, which law could only emanate from the action of constituted authorities. The provision made by the Fugitive Slave Bill for the delivery to their masters of persons escaping from servitude, as it originates from such authority, and is in perfect accordance with the Constitution which declares that such delivery shall be made, is, to all intents and purposes, the "due process of law" that the Amendment requires.

Equally invalid is an argument attempting to prove the unconstitutionality of this Act from its supposed variance with Section 9th of Article 1st, which declares that the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus shall not be suspended, except in cases of rebellion or invasion; because rebellion is neither more nor less than opposition to legitimate authority. All authority is legitimate that is supported by law; the master's authority is supported by law; consequently it is legitimate, and opposition to it becomes rebellion.

As to Article 7th of the Amendments, which declares that the right of trial by jury shall be preserved in all cases where the value in controversy shall exceed the sum of twenty dollars, I cannot perceive that it has any bearing upon the question at issue, since it expressly refers to suits at common law.

Whatever the opposers of this law may say of its injustice, its partiality, or its stringency, its constitutionality can never be disproved. Whatever may be said of the insufficiency of the officials it deputes to arrest the fugitives, the partiality of the tribunal it authorizes to deliver them up, or the inconclusiveness of the testimony it admits as establishing an accusation of bondage, it requires something more than mere invective to make out the invalidity of a law emanating from the highest authority in the nation, and founded upon a clause in the Constitution of the United States.

There is something ridiculous in this hue-and-cry about the constitutionality of this law, especially when it originates with the party that, of all others in our land, has manifested the least respect for that instrument, in so far as it is at variance with their peculiar views. Where was their respect for the Constitution, which expressly declares that the fugitives shall be delivered up when the claim is made, while interposing every imaginable impediment and embarrassment in the way of the master, and virtually preventing him from recovering his servant? Would their great respect for the Constitution be any security for the rights of the South, were trial by jury guarantied to the fugitive? Have we any reason to suppose that, in accordance with that instrument, the fugitive would be delivered up when the claim was made, if this "due process of law" by which the claim is to be made and the delivery effected, was not exceedingly summary and stringent?

I have already said, that under the operation of this law, freemen may be exposed to the risk of being carried into servitude; but, after all, this risk is very slight. To say nothing of the penalty attached to kidnapping a freeman, I will merely state a few facts, which have a particular bearing upon this question. In the State of New Jersey, which lies contiguous to the Slave States, and in which the colored population are quite numerous, fugitives from servitude are frequently captured, but in no one instance, so far as I am aware, has an assault been made upon any freeman. Several fugitives have been captured from this immediate vicinity; but the white inhabitants are too well acquainted with the character and habits of the negroes, to feel much of the spirit of abolitionism, and such captures have never been attended by any outbreak or opposition. In several of these cases, a negro was the informant. In one instance, the fugitive was a woman. Her master and his companions were in the neighborhood for several days. The day before her capture she saw and knew him, but refused to comply with the request of her husband, and secrete herself, because she wanted to make preparations to have a party. At the time of her capture, herself, her child, and another colored woman, were in the house together. She was taken; the others left. They did not feel disposed to run the risk, even here, of assaulting a free woman and carrying her into servitude.

Again, the language employed by some of the before-mentioned writers, is quite as objectionable as their sentiments. In an article upon the Fugitive Slave Bill, recently published in the Recorder, the name of the great and glorious Being who inhabits eternity, is introduced in an exclamatory manner that borders on profanity. In conversation, it would be considered so; it is the same in writing. Especially do I protest against such familiar use of that name, which should never be pronounced but with feelings of the deepest reverence. In the same article we hear of blood-hounds pursuing "God's image," which expression conveys an idea too singularly absurd to be treated seriously, and, at the same time, so degrading and insulting to the Deity, that our risibility is suspended by a sensation of horror. The language of Scripture, that God created man in his own image, could only refer to him in a state of purity and innocence. Besides, it is very questionable how far that expression is justly applicable to the formation of Adam. David says, that man was made a little lower than the angels; but an angel could bear no higher distinction than to be the image of God. Under what similitude did the Almighty see fit to reveal himself to the patriarchs and prophets of old? How infinitely sublime and glorious are the representations of his likeness and his presence? Are we not to consider Him as the embodiment of all that is great, and good, and glorious, and lovely? I should be glad to see the man, Ethiopian or otherwise, who, in refinement, intelligence, and purity, could be considered as the image of God. If that expression has any reference to the physical form, one thing is certain—if the Ethiopian bears that image, the Caucasian does not. Which of the two races is entitled to that distinction, if either, might afford a subject for the speculations of physiologists.

But must the Fugitive Slave Law be obeyed? It must, or ought to be; because we profess obedience to Him, who has commanded us to be in subjection to the powers that be—to Him who commanded Hagar, when she fled from her mistress, to return and submit to her hand—to Him who, speaking through Moses, commanded the children of Israel to buy bondmen and bondwomen of the nations round about—and to Him who, in the language of Paul, commanded servants to be in obedience to their masters. Paul and Silas are in heaven, and their mantles may have descended upon the shoulders of many; but these ancient worthies knew nothing of this anarchical spirit, that, instead of submission to the magistrate, assumes to itself the prerogative of sitting in judgment upon his acts; that, instead of inculcating upon servants the duty of obedience, attempts to instigate and support them in rebellion. The God of Daniel indeed lives, but can any one suppose himself to be doing that Being an acceptable service, while attempting to promote sedition and misrule? Are we Christians?—are we patriots?—are we on the side of peace, union, and safety? Then let us yield a ready, a willing obedience, not to one, or to a part, but to every clause of the Constitution. Let us learn to respect the law for its own sake, whether or not it is perfectly consonant with our own sentiments.

THE AMERICAN BIBLE UNION.

To the Editors of the Sabbath Recorder:—

Your last paper, of Nov. 28th, contains an article headed "The American Bible Union," wherein the writer cautions your readers to examine, before coöperating with that Union, whether it does, or does not, accept also of the support of the South. Will you permit an anti-slavery reader, and a friend of the Bible Union, to state what he considers the true position of the Bible Union with respect to all parties?

The purpose of the American Bible Union is to procure the most faithful version of the Scriptures in the English and all other spoken languages. As every man has a right to read the Bible, so it recognizes the right of every man to contribute his quota to the attainment of this desired object. A pure Bible is a blessing not designed especially for the white or the colored, the bond or the free, the citizen or the foreigner, but one in which all have an equal right and an equal share. For the Union to deny to any man the right of contribution, would be to deny his right to a pure Bible. If the Bible Union were going to make a pro-slavery Bible, it might say to the North, Keep your money; you shall have no interest in it. If it were going to make an anti-slavery Bible, it might say the same to the South. If it were going to make an Episcopalian Bible, it might say to other sects, Keep your money; you have not part nor lot in this. But its purpose is to give as pure and faithful a version of the words of Inspired Scripture in all living languages as can be procured; and to every man who has a desire for this, whatever be his creed, his color, or his station, it says, Give what you can to help on the work.

Whatever is done as service to God's truth, must be done with a good conscience towards God. I have no fear for the result, if your readers put these questions to themselves: Do I desire this blessing for myself and others? Then ought I not to contribute to obtain it? Have I a right to exclude any one from the blessing, and to say, If you pay your share, I will not pay mine? As well might we quarrel with our Father in Heaven, and refuse his sunshine and rain, because "he maketh his sun to rise on the evil and on the good, and sendeth rain on the just and on the unjust." If we are his children in spirit and in truth, we shall adopt this principle as the rule of our action in the matter: A pure Bible is every man's birthright, and no man should be hindered doing what he can to procure it for himself or his neighbor.

THE AMERICAN BIBLE UNION.

To the Editors of the Sabbath Recorder:—

I am sorry to see in your paper of the 28th November, a communication from Eld. Wm. M. Jones, which I believe is calculated to mislead the unwary, and to injure one of the most praiseworthy objects which has been attempted by the people of God in any previous age—namely, "to procure and circulate the most faithful versions of the Sacred Scriptures, in all the languages of the world." This is the exclusive object of the American Bible Union, and I have reason to believe that brother Jones approves of that object.

The Constitution of the American Bible Union is framed with no sectarian aspect. It invites all, of every name and clime, who wish to give the pure Word of God to the whole family of man. This is a work in which none but good men may naturally be expected to coöperate—a work which will continue to commend itself to every one who has the spirit of Him whose word the Bible is.

An Old Disciple.

Dedication.—The Seventh-day Baptist Meeting-House in Leonardsville, N. Y., was opened for Divine worship on Third-day, Nov. 26th. The services were attended by a full assembly. The 132d Psalm was read by Eld. Cutler, of the Baptist Church at Unadilla Forks. The opening prayer was offered by Eld. E. S. Bailey. Eld. Thomas B. Brown, of New York, preached on the occasion an excellent and searching discourse, from Matt. 5: 14—"A city that is set on a hill cannot be hid." If the congregation is not profited thereby, it must be owing to their own neglect. The closing prayer was offered by Eld. Ainsworth, and the benediction by Eld. Joshua Clarke.

This house is built upon the site of the house burnt on the 7th of October, 1849, and is 50 by 36 feet, with an elevated orchestra, but no gallery.

Temperance among the Cherokees.—The Cherokee people have presented a memorial to the Legislature of the State of Arkansas, asking for the enactment of efficient laws for the suppression of the sale of intoxicating drinks by the citizens of Arkansas to to the citizens of Indian nations on their borders. It states that no inebriating liquor is manufactured among the Cherokees, and that the quantities used by the Indians come from abroad, and chiefly through the State of Arkansas.

Magyars in China.—Letters from Berlin state that Mr. Gutzlaff, the Chinese missionary, says he has discovered in an interior province of China, a tribe who speak exactly the same language as the Magyars of Hungary. This tribe is entirely ignorant of Christianity. Two Hungarian gentlemen are going out to China with the missionary on his return, for the purpose of visiting these Chinese Magyars.

Georgia for the Union.—Some weeks ago His Excellency Gorge Washington Bonaparte Towns, Governor of Gorgia, fearing that the people of that State were about to be swallowed alive by the wicked Abolitionits, called a State Convention to devise means to avert so dire a calamity. Candidates for the Convention were at once put in nomination by the people, and the result is, that the Union party have carried the State by an overwhelming majority. There will be scarcely enough disunionists in the Convention to spice it.

Episcopal Convention.—A special convention of Episcopalians of the diocese of New York, was held in this city last week, for the purpose of electing a Provisional Bishop to supply the place of Bishop Onderdonk, suspended. Three days (and part of the nights) were spent in caucusing, debating, and balloting, to no purpose. The Convention adjourned sine die on Sixth-day evening, leaving the diocese in the same bishopless condition that it has been for a long time.

Jenny Lind's Charities.—The proceeds of a morning concert recently given in New York by Jenny Lind have been divided by a Committee appointed for the purpose. The amount was $5,073 23, of which $1,000 was appropriated to the Society for improving the Condition of the Poor, and the remainder to twenty other societies, mostly for the relief of the poor of various classes.

The Synod of Thurles against the Bible.—The late address issued by this Romish Synod in Ireland, contains the following appeal to their flocks: "We exhort you, dearly beloved, with all the fervor of our souls, to be more vigilant than ever in these days of error and infidelity. Avoid all books in which your holy religion is assailed. Cast away those corrupt and condemned versions of the Scriptures, those tracts teeming with calumny and misrepresentation, that are so industriously circulated by the agents of the Bible and other Societies."

Missionary Labor in Hayti.—A letter from Mr. Judd, missionary at Port-au-Prince from the Baptist Free Mission Society, dated Sept. 24, says:—

"Since my last communication we have had nothing of particular interest to write. We have seen no new signs of persecution, and we have been prosecuting our work somewhat in quietness. But there are many who were in the habit of attending our meetings, who seem at present too timid to associate with us. We are, however, continually scattering the good seed of the gospel, in one way or another, of which we sometimes see the fruits. But it is generally like sowing in tears, hoping that others, at least, may enter into our labors, and reap the full harvest."

Rev. Heman Norton, Corresponding Secretary of the American and Foreign Christian Union, died in New York on the 20th of November, aged 51 years. His disease was congestion of the lungs. Mr. Norton was born at New Hartford, Oneida Co., N. Y., in 1800—became pious at the age of 17 years—graduated at Auburn Theological Seminary in 1826—was intimately connected with the revival which spread over the State of New York in connection with the labors of Mr. Finney—and has been for the last ten or twelve years engaged in efforts to benefit the Roman Catholics. The Independent, speaking of Mr. Norton's family, says that "last December he was induced, by the persuasion of a faithful friend, a leading merchant, to insure his life with a Hartford company for $2,500. He had made but three quarterty payments of the premium, not amounting in the whole to $50, and now his family are left secure from want through this forecast—a lesson of prudence which ought to be heeded by every minister, and by every man who lives by a salary or stated income, great or small."

General Intelligence.

Opening of Congress—The President's Message.

The XXXIst Congress re-assembled for its Second Session at Washington on Second-day the 2d inst., at 12 o'clock. There was a quorum in each House, and after the usual forms had been complied with, Congress was permitted to listen to

The President's Message.

As this document is a very long one, and comes to hand at a late hour, we must content ourselves with giving an abstract of it, copying such portions only as relate to subjects of peculiar interest.

The President commences with an allusion to the "painful dispensation of Divine Providence" which removed Gen. Taylor, and elevated the present incumbent to his responsible station. He then sets forth what he considers to be the policy of our Government in its intercourse with foreign nations and in the administration of its internal affairs. "To maintain a strict neutrality in foreign wars, to cultivate friendly relations, to reciprocate every noble and generous act, and to perform punctually and scrupulously every treaty obligation—these are the duties which we owe to other States." In the administration of home affairs, we must adhere to the Constitution, and execute all the laws passed by a majority of the representatives of the people.

We are at peace with all nations, and we enjoy in an eminent degree the blessings of that peace, in a prosperous and growing commerce, and in all the forms of amicable national intercourse.

A treaty has been formed with Great Britain for facilitating and protecting the construction of a ship canal between the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans, and the work will probably be completed with all practical expedition.

The plan of connecting the two oceans by a railroad across the Isthmus of Tehuantepec, is still entertained, and will be prosecuted as soon as some trifling obstacles are removed.

Portugal has not paid the claims of our citizens, but a proposition made by the Government of Portugal for the final adjustment of those claims, has recently been accepted on the part of the United States.

The relations between those parts of the Island of St. Domingo, which were formerly colonies of Spain and France, respectively, are still in an unsettled state. There is reason, however, to hope for an early settlement.

The report of the Secretary of the Treasury shows that the total receipts into the Treasury, for the year ending June last, were $47,421,748 90. The total expenditures during the same period were $43,002,168 90. The public debt has been reduced since the last annual report from the Treasury Department $495,276 79. The President thinks that not much reliance can be placed upon the proceeds of the sales of public lands for several years to come as a source of revenue.

All experience, according to the President, has demonstrated the wisdom and policy of raising a large portion of revenue for the support of Government from duties on goods imported. He recommends specific duties, instead of ad valorem; or home valuation, in the event of the failure to obtain the former. He also advises ambulatory appraisers in any event, for the detection of frauds, which, under the present system, have operated seriously against the revenue and American manufactures.

The early establishment of a mint in California is recommended.

The establishment of an Agricultural Bureau is recommended; also the employment of a competent mineralogist and chemist to investigate and report upon the mineral resources of the country.

The attention of Congress is called to the importance of opening "a line of communication, the best and most expeditious of which the nature of the country will admit," between the valley of the Mississippi and the Pacific.

The appointment of commissioners to examine and adjust California land titles, is suggested; also the propriety of extending our system of land laws, with such modifications as may be necessary, over the State of California, and the territories of Utah and New Mexico. The mineral lands of California, the President thinks, should be divided into small parcels and sold.

Texas and New Mexico are greatly troubled by the Indians, and steps to protect their borders are proposed, especially the raising of one or more regiments of mounted men.

For facts in relation to the Army and Navy, the President refers Congress to the Reports of the Secretaries. He recommends, besides, the establishment of an asylum for the relief of disabled and destitute soldiers, and a pension list for retiring officers of the army and navy. He also calls attention to the importance of a revision of the code for the government of the navy.

The Message makes a very favorable report of the condition of the Post Office Department. The number of Post Offices now is, 18,417—an increase of 1670 during the year. The revenue of the Department for the year ending June 30, 1850, was $5,552,971 48; expenditures $5,212,953 43; leaving a surplus of $340,018 05. "The fiscal condition of the Department is such as to justify the Postmaster General in recommending the reduction of inland letter postage to three cents the single letter when prepaid, and five cents when not prepaid. He also recommends that the prepaid rate shall be reduced to two cents whenever the revenues of the Department, after the reduction, shall exceed its expenditures by more than five per cent. for two consecutive years; that the postage upon California and other letters sent by our ocean steamers shall be much reduced; and that the rates of postage on newspapers, pamphlets, periodicals, and other printed matter, shall be modified, and some reduction thereon made."

Liberal appropriations for light-houses, river and harbor improvements, &c., are recommended; also to meet the necessities of the District of Columbia. The President likewise recommends the appointment of a commissioner to settle all private claims against the United States, and so save the time of Congress.

Texas has not yet answered the propositions for settling the disputed boundary between that State and the Territory of New Mexico.

The following reference to the measures of the last Congress closes the Message:—

"It was hardly to have been expected that the series of measures passed at your last session, with the view of healing the sectional differences which had sprung from the slavery and territorial question, should at once have realized their beneficent purpose. All mutual concession in the nature of a compromise must necessarily be unwelcome to men of extreme opinions. And though without such concessions our Constitution could not have been formed, and cannot be permanently sustained, yet we have seen them made the subjects of bitter controversy in both sections of the Republic. It required many months of discussion and deliberation to secure the concurrence of a majority of Congress in their favor. It would be strange if they had been received with immediate approbation by people and States, prejudiced and heated by the exciting controversies of their representatives. I believe those measures to have been required by the circumstances and condition of the country. I believe they were necessary to allay asperities and animosities that were rapidly alienating one section of the country from another, and destroying those fraternal sentiments which are the strongest supports of the Constitution. They were adopted in the spirit of conciliation, and for the purpose of conciliation. I believe that a great majority of our fellow-citizens sympathize in that spirit, and that purpose, and in the main approve, and are prepared, in all respects, to sustain these enactments. I cannot doubt that the American people, bound together by kindred blood and common traditions, still cherish a paramount regard for the Union of their fathers; and that they are ready to rebuke any attempt to violate its integrity, to disturb the compromises on which it is based, or to resist the laws which have been enacted under its authority.

"The series of measures to which I have alluded are regarded by me as a settlement, in principle and substance—a final settlement, of the dangerous and exciting subjects which they embraced. Most of these subjects, indeed, are beyond your reach, as the legislation which disposed of them was, in its character, final and irrevocable. It may be presumed from the opposition which they all encountered that none of those measures were free from imperfections, but in their mutual dependence and connexion they formed a system of compromise, the most conciliatory, and best for the entire country, that could be obtained from conflicting sectional interests and opinions.

"For this reason I recommend your adherence to the adjustment established by those measures, until time and experience shall demonstrate the necessity of further legislation to guard against evasion or abuse.

"By that adjustment we have been rescued from the wide and boundless agitation that surrounded us, and have a firm, distinct, and legal ground to rest upon. And the occasion, I trust, will justify me in exhorting my countrymen to rally upon and maintain that ground as the best, if not the only means, of restoring peace and quiet to the country, and maintaining inviolate the integrity of the Union.

"And now, fellow-citizens, I cannot bring this communication to a close without invoking you to join me in humble and devout thanks to the Great Ruler of nations, for the multiplied blessings which he has graciously bestowed upon us. His hand, so often visible in our preservation, has stayed the pestilence, saved us from foreign wars and domestic disturbances, and scattered plenty throughout the land. Our liberties, religious and civil, have been maintained; the fountains of knowledge have all been kept open, and means of happiness widely spread and generally enjoyed, greater than have fallen to the lot of any other nation. And, while deeply penetrated with gratitude for the past, let us hope that his all-wise Providence will so guide our counsels, as that they shall result in giving satisfaction to our constituents, securing the peace of the country, and adding new strength to the united Government under which we live.

WASHINGTON, December 2d, 1850.

Seven Days Later from Europe.

The steamer Europa, with one week later news from Liverpool, arrived at Boston on the 29th Nov.

The probability of a war between Prussia and Austria is increasing; indeed, several brushes are reported to have taken place already. All Germany is arming; Austria and Bavaria ditto.

France, England and Russia have offered their mediation on the German question. The latest accounts are more peaceable, although in Vienna war is now looked upon as certain.

Louis Napoleon has sent a long message to the Assembly, which has given general satisfaction. He disclaims all personal ambition.

The No-Popery cry is going down in England. It appears that there is only half a million Catholics in all England, and but eight millions in all Ireland, Canada and Australia.

The Lord Mayor's recent Annual Public Dinner was marked by unusual brilliancy. Hon. Abbott Lawrence was present, and made a speech, which is characterized by the papers as earnest, eloquent, truthful and impassioned, and is said to have been in fine taste throughout.

Advices from Berlin, dated the 6th ult., state that Count Bradenburg, President of the Council, had died that morning. The immediate cause of the illness of the Minister was the result of the Count's mission to Warsaw, in which he was completely outwitted by the Austrian and Russian diplomatists. Delirious fever was the malady which caused death.

A riot against the Christian population has broken out at Aleppo. A multitude of Franks were killed, and their houses sacked and burned. The Turkish soldiers remained quiet spectators of these outrages.

There have been two smart shocks of earthquakes at Malta, which damaged the walls of several old buildings.

M. Gustave Schwab, a popular poet of Germany, died on the 4th at Stutgart, aged 58.

The Government of Prussia has prohibited the dispatch of private messages by electric telegraph throughout its dominions.

The Spanish Government has resolved to establish an astronomical observatory at Madrid.

At Constantinople, on the 25th of October, a war-ship blew up, killing over 900 men.

WATERTOWN AND ROME RAILROAD.—We learn from an authentic source, says the N. Y. Tribune, that the Watertown and Rome Railroad, extending from Rome to Cape Vincent on the St. Lawrence, opposite the City of Kingston, U. C., is fast progressing to completion. Business on the portion now in operation more than meets the anticipations of the friends and projectors of the Road; and what is rather uncommon, the cost of the enterprise promises to come within the estimates, or not materially exceed them. The Road, when completed, will be ninety-seven miles in length. The laying of the rail commences at Rome, to be carried on continuously to its Northern terminus. About one-half the estimated cost of the whole work, $625,000, has been paid out. All the right of way, with small exceptions—grading, bridging, culverts, &c., are in sufficient forwardness to allow the rail to be laid as far as Watertown, seventy-three miles, by the 4th of July next; and a large amount of work is done between Watertown and Cape Vincent, including piers for a bridge across Chaumont Bay. The cars are now running thirty-five miles, and will be forty-two miles in this month.

GREAT HURRICANE AND LOSS OF LIFE.—A dispatch to the N. Y. Tribune, from Louisville, dated Nov. 30, says that one of the most appalling and destructive tornadoes which has been experienced in the Mississippi Valley for several years, occurred about two o'clock that afternoon. It swept over the town of Cape Girardeau, Mo., situated on the Mississippi river, just below St. Louis, and demolished some seventy or eighty buildings, many of them the finest and principal business houses in the place. The Baptist and Catholic Churches, and the Catholic Convent were destroyed. The steamboat Saranac, No. 2, which had just rounded to at the wharf, had her upper works blown off, and several persons on her were severely injured, and some, it is probable, were drowned. The wharf boat was likewise blown from her moorings, and almost irreparably injured.

The loss of life, by this awful visitation, cannot as yet be ascertained, but it is certainly very great, as numbers are doubtless buried beneath the ruins of the fallen buildings. There are also a great many persons who are seriously injured, and some of them are so crippled and maimed that they will never recover from the effects.

OBERLIN COLLEGE.—The Oberlin Evangelist says that this institution has resolved to assume the name, as it has for sixteen years exercised the full functions, of a college. The trustees have at length resolved to appeal to the public for an endowment. It has hitherto depended on the tuition bills and temporary subscriptions raised by soliciting agents. It is stated that Professor Finney will resume his labors as Professor of Theology in the Spring. The annual catalogue for 1850-51, contains the names of 534 students, 322 males, and 212 females. Of these 23 are in the Theological Department, 69 in the College, 25 in the Teachers' class, and 205 in the Preparatory.

THE HAVRE DE GRACE BANK CASE.—A dispatch dated Baltimore, Wednesday, Nov. 27, says that the Grand Jury of Hartford County have presented the following persons for embezzling the funds of the Havre de Grace Bank:—

Moses Y. Beach of N. Y.	$19,000
Henry Beach of N. Y.	10,000
J. Hollister of Buffalo	10,000
N. Jenkins of Milan, Ohio	10,000
John Palter of Buffalo	10,000
John P. Gay of Milan, Ohio	10,000
Ezra Collins of Havre de Grace	10,000

Gov. Thomas will immediately issue his requisition for the persons thus indicted.

SUMMARY.

A dispatch dated Batavia, N. Y., Nov. 29, says: The express and emigrant trains came in collision to-day at this place, and several passengers were injured, some of them very badly. One lady it is thought cannot survive. Mr. Houghtal, a Collector in the emigrant train, had his leg broken and ancle dislocated.

Accounts from St. Domingo City to the 2d represent that through the intervention of the English and Americans, a treaty of peace between the Dominicans and Haytiens had been concluded. Previous to this there had been some brisk fighting between the contending parties, but nothing serious.

The work on the Canandaigua and Corning railroad is being prosecuted with all possible dispatch, and it is expected that by the first of August next it will be completed and in running order. By this route the time between Rochester and New York will be reduced to about 14 hours.

There is a great emigration to Texas; about 500 per week have arrived at Galveston, and it is estimated that 25,000 have arrived during the present season, many bringing large numbers of slaves.

Hon. Amos E. Wood, of the 6th Ohio District, died suddenly on the 19th. He was elected last spring to fill the vacancy occasioned by the death of Hon. Mr. Dickinson.

On the night of Nov. 22d, two Irishmen were shot dead, and two others wounded, in the neighborhood of Alfred, N. Y. An overseer, who was in some way connected with the affray, was badly hurt.

Thompson's Bank Note Reporter throws suspicion on the Erie (Pa.) Bank; says it has been refusing to pay specie on its notes for some time past, unless on small amounts of say $10 or $15.

On the 28th ult., the steamer Columbus was burnt at the mouth of the Potomac. The crew were all saved. She was used as a passenger and freight boat between Baltimore and Richmond.

One day last week a dispatch was received by the Chief of Police, New York, from Providence, setting forth that James Hall, a married man, residing at that place, had eloped with Miss Jane Tracy, a romantic young lady of 16 summers. Hall was minutely described, and Sergeant Finney of the Second Ward Police was dispatched to find him. He proceeded to the Philadelphia boat, and there espied the couple, who were at once arrested and sent home.

The Detroit Advertiser has a piece of oak, some three feet long, found in an ancient shaft in the Minnesota diggings, sunk by a race of men whose existence is unknown to history or legend. This piece of wood, which formed a part of one shaft or the ladder which was used for descending the shaft, was taken out at a depth of twenty-seven feet from the surface, and is solid. A gentleman in Detroit has in his possession stone hammers found at the same spot.

The Montreal Herald publishes a statement of the quantity of eggs packed in the Bonsecours Market, and exported to the United States, from the 15th of June last to the 15th of November—five months—showing that 3,000 barrels, containing 84 dozen, equal to 252,168 dozen, at 7½d per dozen, have been exported. Of oats for packing, 6,004 bushels were used. The value of the trade during that period was $8,530.

Mr. Jacob Strawn, an extensive landholder and cattle-dealer, and probably the wealthiest citizen of Illinois—owning 40,000 acres of land in that State—was brought down to St. Louis from the Illinois River on the 15th ult., in a state of insanity. He is in charge of his friends, and on his way to Columbus, Ohio, to undergo a course of treatment for his complaint. The disease is supposed to have been induced by the monomania of the desire of wealth.

A few days since some workmen engaged in clearing the foundation of an old house in 127th street, near Harlem River, found a keg of gold and silver coins. The house was formerly occupied both by British and American troops. It was burned down in the Revolution, and several Hessians were known to have been engaged in digging among the ruins for the treasure now found.

The citizens of Rochester held a meeting recently, for the purpose of adopting measures to secure the location of the next State Fair in that city. A Committee of Fifteen was appointed to obtain subscriptions to defray the expenses of necessary buildings, ascertain the price of board at hotels, and to secure suitable grounds for the exhibition. The Buffalo papers are putting in claims for that city.

A Canada paper says: At the recent assizes in the Home (Toronto) District, the Jury gave a verdict of £700 damages against Lieut. Munroe, of the Royal Canadian Rifles, for seducing the daughter of Capt. Hamilton, of the same regiment; the affair took place on St. Helen's Island, and from the evidence it appears that the fellow, Munroe, must have been a heartless scoundrel.

Sir Benjamin Brodie received from the estate of Sir Robert Peel $1,200 for his last visits and attendance, merely looking upon the patient and doing absolutely nothing—Sir Robert refusing to have his rib set, owing to his acute sensitiveness to pain. The People's Medical Enquirer says, "Chloroform ought to have been administered, when there would have been a chance for furnishing relief by setting the broken bone during the unconsciousness produced."

One of the nurses in the marine department of the New York Hospital, named John Fails, a few days ago, informed Mr. Morgan, one of the superintendents of the institution, that he wished to resign his situation, in consequence of having just received the gratifying intelligence from Europe, that a suit in Chancery had recently been decided in London, whereby himself and three brothers had fallen heirs to the enormous sum of £80,000 sterling.

A petition signed by B. B. Mussy, Coffin Pitts, and about one hundred others of the friends of Hon. George Thompson, has been presented to the Board of Aldermen of the City of Boston, asking for the use of Faneuil Hall, on the third of December, for those "friendly to George Thompson to hear an address from him." The petition was discussed at some length, and finally tabled.

Ingalls. It is drawn by the New England Bank, Cincinnati; G. M. Hatch, Cashier, on Charles Mix, Esq., 49 William-st., New York. This is a mixture we advise our western readers not to take, says the Tribune.

Proclamation,

By HAMILTON FISH, Governor of the State of N. Y

The mercies of an all-kind Providence call for an acknowledgment of gratitude and of dependence from the creatures of his bounties.

The year which is about to close has been marked by innumerable blessings to us as a Nation. Abundant harvest and profitable labor have brought rich rewards to honest industry. Peace and tranquility are established at home; and no discord disturbs our relations abroad. Health, prosperity, and abundance, have been freely vouchsafed to us. Civil and religious liberty prevail throughout the length and breadth of the land. And to us all is secured the free exercise of the worship of their Creator according to their own faith. And on this occasion we should not forget, that while an inscrutable Providence has seen fit to remove during the past year the Chief Magistrate of our Union, that same Providence has preserved us under the trial a free and united People, has saved us from anarchy or civil commotion, and has continued to us the mild operation of a Government of our own adoption and rulers of our own choice.

I do, therefore, designate and recommend THURSDAY, THE TWELFTH DAY OF DECEMBER NEXT, to be observed by the good People of this State as a day of Public Thanksgiving to Almighty God.

In witness whereof I have hereunto subscribed my name and affixed the Privy Seal of the State, [L. S.] at the City of Albany, the 31st day of October, one thousand eight hundred and fifty.

HAMILTON FISH.

ROBERT H. MORRIS, Private Secretary.

Miscellaneous.

From the Home Journal.

The Indian Summer.

There is a time, just ere the frost
Prepares to pave old Winter's way,
When Autumn, in a reverie lost,
The mellow day-time dreams away;

When Summer comes, in musing mind,
To gaze once more on hill and dell,
To mark how many sheaves they bind,
And see if all is ripened well.

With balmy breath she whispers low;
The dying flowers look up and give
Their sweetest incense ere they go,
For her who made their beauties live.

She enters 'neath the woodland shade,
Her zephyrs lift the lingering leaf,
And bear it gently where are laid
The loved and lost ones of its grief.

She seeks the shore; old ocean heaves,
In gladness huge, his mighty breast;
Prisons his wild winds in their caves,
And basking in her smiles, is blest.

At last old Autumn, rising, takes
Again his scepter and his throne;
With boist'rous hand the trees he shakes,
Intent on gathering all his own.

Sweet Summer, sighing, flies the plain,
And waiting Winter, gaunt and grim,
Sees miser Autumn hoard his grain,
And thinks it's all for him!

Fearful Encounter with a Lioness.

Suddenly I observed a number of vultures seated on the plain about a quarter of a mile ahead of us, and close beside them stood a huge lioness, consuming a blesbok which she had killed. She was assisted in her repast by about a dozen jackals, which were feasting along with her in the most friendly and confidential manner. Directing my followers' attention to the spot, I remarked, "I see the lion;" to which they replied, "What? whar! Yah! Almagtig! dat is he;" and instantly reining in their steeds and wheeling about, they pressed their heels to the horses' sides, and were preparing to betake themselves to flight. I asked them, what they were going to do. To which they answered, "We have not yet placed caps on our rifles." This was true; but while this short conversation was passing, the lioness had observed us. Raising her full, round face, she overhauled us for a few seconds, and then set off at a smart canter toward a range of mountains some miles to the northward; the whole troop of jackals also started off in another direction; there was, therefore, no time to think of caps. The first move was to bring her to bay, and not a second was to be lost. Spurring my good and lively steed, and shouting to my men to follow, I flew across the plain, and being fortunately mounted on Colesberg, the flower of my stud, I gained upon her at every stride. This was to me a joyful moment, and I at once made up my mind that she or I must die.

The lioness having a long start of me, we went over a considerable extent of ground before I came up with her. She was a large, full-grown beast, and the bare and level nature of the plain added to her imposing appearance. Finding that I gained upon her, she reduced her pace from a canter to a trot, carrying her tail stuck out behind her, and slued a little to one side. I shouted loudly to her to halt, as I wished to speak with her; upon which she suddenly pulled up, and sat on her haunches like a dog, with her back toward me, not even deigning to look round. She then appeared to say to herself, "Does this fellow know whom he is after?" Having thus sat for half a minute, as if involved in thought, she sprang to her feet, and, facing about, stood looking at me for a few seconds, moving her tail slowly from side to side, showing her teeth, and growling fiercely. She next made a short run forward, making a loud, rumbling noise, like thunder. This she did to intimidate me; but finding that I did not flinch an inch nor seem to heed her hostile demonstrations, she quietly stretched out her massive arms, and lay down on the grass. My Hottentots now coming up, we all three dismounted, and, drawing our rifles from their holsters, we looked to see if the powder was up in the nipples, and put on our caps. While this was doing, the lioness sat up, and showed evident symptoms of uneasiness. She looked first at us, and then behind her, as if to see if the coast were clear; after which she made a short run toward us, uttering her deep-drawn murderous growls. Having secured the three horses to one another by their reins, we led them on as if we intended to pass her, in the hope of obtaining a broadside. But this she carefully avoided to expose, presenting only her full front. I had given Stofolus my Moore rifle, with orders to shoot her if she should spring upon me, but on no account to fire before me. Kleinboy was to stand ready to hand me my Purdey rifle, in case the two-grooved Dixon should not prove sufficient. My men as yet had been steady, but they were in a precious stew, their faces having assumed a ghastly paleness, and I had a painful feeling that I could place no reliance on them.

Now, then, for it, neck or nothing! She is within sixty yards of us, and she keeps advancing. We turned the horses' tails to her. I knelt on one side, and, taking a steady aim at her breast, let fly. The ball cracked loudly on her tawny hide, and crippled her in the shoulder, upon which she charged with an appalling roar, and in the twinkling of an eye she was in the midst of us. At this moment Stofolus' rifle exploded in his hand, and Kleinboy, whom I had ordered to stand ready by me, danced about like a duck in a gale of wind. The lioness sprang upon Colesberg, and fearfully lacerated his ribs and haunches with her horrid teeth and claws; the worst wound was on his haunch, which exhibited a sickening, yawning gash, more than twelve inches long, almost laying bare the very bone. I was very cool and steady, and did not feel in the least degree nervous, having fortunately great confidence in my own shooting; but I must confess, when the whole affair was over, I felt that it was a very awful situation, and attended with extreme peril, as I had no friend with me on whom I could rely.

When the lioness sprang on Colesberg, I stood out from the horses, ready with my second barrel for the first chance she should give me for a clear shot. This she quickly did; for, seemingly satisfied with the revenge she had now taken, she quitted Colesberg, and, sluing her tail to one side, trotted sulkily past within a few paces of me, taking one step to the left. I pitched my rifle to my shoulder, and in another instant the lioness was stretched on the plain a lifeless corpse. In the struggles of death she half turned on her back, and stretched her neck and forearms convulsively, when she fell back to her former position; her mighty arms fell powerless by her side, her lower jaw fell, blood streamed from her mouth, and she expired. The School Mistress and her Canine Friend.

One of the most touching instances of canine attachment, of which we ever heard, was related to us the other day, by a matron of the neighborhood where the finale of the melancholy event transpired.

"A young lady of one of the northern towns of this county, while engaged in teaching school, the past summer, a few miles from her home, was singled out towards the close of the engagement, without any apparent inducement, by the dog of one of her employers, as the peculiar object of his regard, which soon unaccountably increased to such a degree that he could scarcely be beaten from her side, or prevented from entering the school-house, to which he daily repaired. At the termination of her school, which she left in failing health, when about to start for her paternal residence, the dog gave signs of his determination to follow her, which perceiving, she turned to the owner, and soon effected a purchase of the animal, which now joyously attended her home. Her first words, on entering the house, were—'Mother, I have come home to die, and have brought a friend here to watch over my grave.' After making this announcement she immediately took to her bed, and sunk rapidly in a typhoid, which in about a week terminated in her death.

During her whole sickness, the faithful and evidently sorrow-stricken dog never, but for a few moments at a time, left the sick room, constantly lying directly near the head of her bed, and seeming but too blest when permitted to lick her fevered hand, which was occasionally extended for his tender caresses. As her final hour drew near, he became indifferent about food, and soon refused it altogether. After her death, which he seemed to comprehend, he continued to watch by the corpse, only at one time leaving it, and that was when the coffin case, which having arrived with the coffin, was carried [and placed by the grave previously dug in an enclosure near the house. He then, having somewhow been made aware of what was going on, came out of the house, went to the case, and with his paws on the side, looked in and seemed to examine it attentively. He next jumped down into the grave, and appeared to inspect that also with equal care and attention. He then came out and hurried back to his post by the corpse, which he continued to watch till it was brought out for interment, when he closely followed the coffin, and looked sorrowfully on, as it was lowered to its final resting place, and the grave filled up. When his human fellow-mourners retired, however, he remained behind, and lying down at the head of the grave, could not be induced to leave the spot, refusing, for the first few days, all food, then for a week or two sparingly received it when brought to him, and at last going occasionally to the house for it, but only to dispatch in haste what was set before him, and return to his sad and lonely vigil, which, night and day, he still continues to keep up over the remains of his beloved mistress. Germans and Mormons in Western Texas.

A member of the Mexican Boundary Commission writes to the Providence Journal from Fredericksburgh, on the very confines of civilization, the following account of the settlers they have met in that region:—

The road over which we have come is wretched most of the way—rocky beyond description—very hilly, with some hills of considerable elevation. On the banks of the Guadalupe river, which is about 80 to 100 feet wide, and which we forded, we found three log-houses, and not having seen a human habitation or a living creature during the day, we very naturally rode up to them. The buildings were as rude as any you ever saw, in fact, more so; you may therefore judge of my surprise, on entering the first one, to see a man of about 40, with a long beard, dressed in a pair of coarse pantaloons and a checked shirt open at the breast, showing a skin tanned by the hot sun almost as dark as that of an Indian, and sitting at a rude table engaged in reducing to paper some meteorological observations. But my surprise was increased on looking around at the rude walls of the hut, which were lined with books.

Professor Bär, the person alluded to, rose and welcomed us in good English, when I informed him who we were. He then told us that he and the several gentlemen who had just entered, belonged to a colony of Germans who had settled there two years before; that they owned a tract of land a league square, and had several hundred acres under cultivation. He had been a Professor of Natural History in Germany. His library embraced some 2,000 volumes, all of the best class, including natural history, chemistry, mineralogy, voyages and travels, history, etc. They were in various languages, but chiefly in German. I have been in many libraries, but this presented the strangest medley I ever saw. The furniture of this primitive library consisted of a broad table, a few chairs covered with undressed skins, and a bedstead of the rudest kind, on which lay a bed made of husks, but no clothes on it. Floor there was none; the hard, dry earth answered instead. Windows there were, but no glass in them. Several deer's antlers were fastened to one side of the room, on which were suspended sundry garments, and the remaining space not filled with books was occupied with rifles and fowling pieces, of which I counted ten.

The other gentlemen we saw seemed intelligent, and of a higer order than we usually see at the North among the German emigrants. They seemed very happy, had all they desired, and were perfectly independent of the world. In an adjoining house was quite a family of women and children belonging to the same company. In this were a piano and some fine old oil paintings.

On the opposite side of the Guadalupe we came to another cluster of log-houses, at which we stopped. These were also occupied by Germans. The principal gave me his card, which bore the name Dr. Ernst Kopp, Professor. There were more comforts in this house than any I had ever seen. The ladies and children were neatly dressed, and the appearance of the whole establishment resembled a country house in New England more than in an Indian country 2,500 miles off.

After traveling on some five or six miles, we came to well-built rail fences and enclosures, and soon afterwards to cultivated fields. After fording the Perdinalis river, we came suddenly upon a village, the very aspect of which showed us that it was neither a Mexican or a German settlement.

Driving up to the best looking house in the place, we were met at the gate by a portly looking man of about 50, from whom we learned that we were in a Mormon settlement, bearing the remarkable and unique name of Zodiac. I complimented Mr. Wright, the leader, in whose house we then were, on the originality of the name, as being infinitely superior to those universally common names of the revolution, of which every State in the Union thinks she must have a few dozen.

Mr. Wright told us he came to this country two years ago, with a little colony of one hundred and fifty persons, men, women and children. He planted himself in a wilderness, and had no neighbors within miles. His people hold everything in common. The village consisted of a single broad avenue, with well built houses on either side. There is a respectable looking place of worship, painted white, the lower story of which is a store, where goods are furnished to the brethren as they require them, without charge. Mr. Wright told me his crop of corn this year would be 7,000 bushels, which is worth to him $1 25 per bushel. There were a number of small children running about, from 10 to 13 years of age, which Mr. W. said earned $5 a day working in his corn field.

How they Buy and Sell among the Levantines.

As a general rule, the buyer enters and asks if such and such a thing is to be procured. On an affirmative answer being given, he asks to see the article; which, often, is not the one he really wants. He then, if he has seen a piece of silk, incidentally requests to be shown a piece of muslin. Having handled and examined the merchandize, he says,

"How much?"

An exorbitant sum is generally demanded, on which it is often customary to affect great indignation, followed by a ridiculously low offer, twenty paistres instead of fifty. The shopkeeper instantly replies,

"I will buy of you as much as you like for thirty-five."

I have often noticed, that in saying this, he indicates the price he is willing to accept. An immense amount of talk follows, the customer appealing sometimes to his friends, (for he seldom comes alone,) sometimes to any stranger who may be near, and sometimes to the good feeling of the shopkeeper. Not unfrequently he goes so far as to take hold of his beard, or pat his cheek with his hands. A brother dealer, who may or may not be a casual visitor, occasionally interferes and pretends to intercede for the customer, naming as very moderate a price which will leave a good profit; and at length an agreement is come to. The matter is not, however, even then definitely arranged, the shopkeeper often requiring the money to be laid down before he measures and cuts the merchandize. A very animated discussion likewise always takes place on the value of the infinite variety of coins which are produced, generally from the knotted corner of a shawl or a handkerchief, or if the purchaser be a woman, of a veil or mantle. At length, when this matter is settled, the Taggar takes his dra or measure, and in many cases, I am sorry to say, exhibits great ingenuity in saving a few inches. In reality, however, he gains nothing; for before he is allowed to cut, the purchaser cries in a fierce voice, "Zowwad shwoyeh!" "Lengthen a little!" that is, "Give a little over;" and after some altercation he always consents. A man whom I detected cheating by about half an inch every measure, and who was compelled to give some inches over at the end, assured me that he would much rather act straightforwardly, but that the custom was so deeply rooted, that, whether he behaved honestly or not, he would be supposed to do the contrary, and be compelled to give the usual compensation at last, which would greatly diminish his profits. In the case of men selling common calicos, and other cheap articles, at so many paras the dra, this would certainly be the case.

[Two Years in a Levantine Family.

The Power of a Tear.

Miss Bremer says, "In the dreadful year of famine here (Dalecarlia,) 1838, there came to me one day a Dalman, from another parish, and said to me, 'Sell me a few tons of straw.' The man was one of those great stalwart figures, which you can seldom see, except here, yet he had evidently suffered for want of food. He had drawn his hat with its broad brim deep over his face. 'I cannot sell the straw,' said I, at his entreaty; 'I have not more than I shall need myself, and the poor of my own parish.' 'Sell but one ton,' implored he. 'Not even that can I,' I replied; 'that which I have left I must carefully preserve for myself and my people.' 'Half a ton, then,' persisted the Dalman, pressingly. 'It grieves me,' said I, 'but not a single half ton can I spare thee.' The huge fellow took a step nearer to me, said not a word, but lifted his hat above his brow, and gazed fixedly upon me; he let me see that he wept. The sight of this anguish I could not sustain. 'Come with me,' said I, 'thou shall have what thou wilt.' He followed me, and got the straw that he wanted. 'If this were for myself,' he said, 'I should not probably have been here; for, if we men suffer and endure want, it is no more than our sins deserve, and we can and ought to bear it; but the poor animals—what can they have done amiss?'"

Keeping Beets and Turnips for the Table.—The epidermis of the beet and turnip root, unlike that of the potato, admits the rapid escape of moisture, and hence, if exposed to dry air for a few days, they begin to wilt and lose their freshness. Buried in heaps out of doors, they keep well, but are hard to get at in winter. Good substitutes have been devised, by lining and covering the boxes which contain them in the cellar, with flakes of turf; or by burying them in barrels with slightly moist clean sand. A more convenient way, however, is to substitute slightly moist peat for the sand, which is very much lighter than sand, and more easily applied and removed.

The Irish in the United States.

Stigmatized at home as indolent and slovenly, you have only to get them moved out of Ireland, to see what a different nature is at the bottom. How busy, industrious, thrifty, and foreseeing, the Irishman then becomes! How steady, laborious, and patient! His very nature seems to change, and his whole being is altered and improved. Among the fine traits of the Irish people, is the strength of family affection among them; they stick to each other while a shilling remains, and share alike to the last farthing. One member of a family first ventures into the States, sometimes a young man, sometimes a girl; they commend themselves to their employers by their industry, save a little money, and the first use they make of it is to dispatch it home to their friends, to send out another member of the family. One after another emigrates, until at last the whole are transplanted to the American soil. The amount of money yearly sent to Ireland for this purpose is immense. Thus, in the year ending December 31st, 1849, not less than £327,722 was transmitted home from emigrants in America, to their poor friends in Ireland, through the principal Liverpool houses, besides a large amount through smaller houses, which cannot be ascertained. In addition to this, the Liverpool shipping houses received payments of passages on the American side for about 19,000 emigrants from Ireland, or an amount of $58,800. These passages are usually paid during the winter, the parties whose passages are paid receiving an intimation to be ready to "come over" in the spring. We rejoice to see this transplantation going forward. Races of men, like plants, sometimes require a change of soil to enable them to thrive. The baneful influences of antiquated and pernicious institutions are thus summarily got rid of.

[Eliza Cook's Journal.

The Territory of the Mormons is unequaled as a stock-raising country. The finest pastures of Lombardy are not more estimable than those on the east side of the Utah Lake and Jordan River. We find here that cereal anomaly, the bunch grass. In May, when the other grasses perish, this fine plant dries upon its stalk, and becomes a light yellow straw, full of flavor and nourishment. It continues thus, through what are the dry months of the climate, till January, and then starts with a vigorous growth, like that of our own winter wheat in April, which keeps on till the return of another May. Whether as straw or grass, the cattle fatten on it the year round. The numerous little dells and sheltered spots that are found in the mountains are excellent sheep-walks; it is said that the wool which is grown upon them is of a fine pile and soft texture. Hogs fatten on a succulent bulb or tuber, called the Seacoe, or Saegose root, which I hope will soon be naturalized with us. It is highly esteemed as a table vegetable by the Mormons and Indians, and I remark that they are cultivating it with interest at the French Garden of Plants.

A Heroic Wife.—The Frankfort (Ky.) correspondent of the Louisville Journal, under date of Nov. 11, says:—

"Three men of bully reputation went into the house of a gentleman in Paris, Ky., and asked his wife where he was, avowing their business to be to tie him up and whip him for slapping the mulatto child of one of their chums. She replied that he was in his shop. They went off, and she followed them into the shop unperceived, and picked up a mallet and chisel. One of the men drew a knife and pistol, and advanced to the husband, who was cornered, squalling murder. The lady, however, advanced with necessary speed, and dealt the assailant a blow with the mallet upon the shoulder, dislocated it, and silenced him. The second was met by the woman, and a blow with the same instrument, dealt with such force on the forehead as to break the skull, put him hors du combat. The heroine then turned to her husband, and found him tussling with the third on the floor. She went to work upon the third gentleman's head as deliberately as circumstances allowed, and soon succeeded in relieving her husband from all fear of 'murder' at his hands. All the gentlemen assailants had to be packed home."

The Slave Trade in Cuba.—On the very night preceding the landing of the late Cuban Expedition at Cardenas, says the New Orleans Delta, a large vessel came quietly up to the wharf, and landed six hundred negroes from the hold, poor, miserable, half-starved shadows of men, who had been torn from their homes in Africa, and introduced into the island by the consent and to the great profit of the Captain General of Cuba. Shortly after this occurrence, a bag containing about $20,000 was found at the door of the Captain General's sleeping room, which, as there appears no acknowledgment for the same in the published reports of the receipts by the treasury, we presume, went to swell the already large pile of savings of Conde Alcoy during his very economical administration.

Testimony of a Rich Man.—The late Mr. McDonogh, the millionaire, in his will, says:—

"Let the poorer classes of the world be consoled and assured that the labor-loving, frugal, industrious and virtuous among them possess joys and happiness in this life which the rich know not and cannot appreciate. So well convinced am I, after a long life and intercourse with my fellow men of all classes, of the truth, 'that the happiness of this life is altogether on the side of the virtuous and industrious poor,' that, had I children (which I have not) and a fortune to leave behind me at death, I would bequeath, after a virtuous education, to effect which nothing should be spared, a very small amount to each, merely sufficient to excite them to habits of industry and frugality, and no more."

Unheaded Cabbages.—There are often many of these when the crop is gathered at the approach of winter, commonly thrown away as useless. They may be rendered fine for spring use by transplanting them in a double row, and then covering them with boards or slabs like the steep roof of a house, with an additional coating of a few inches of earth. They should then be properly ventilated. By next spring a large portion of them will be found well headed and delicately blanched.

Spheroidal State of Water.—M. Boutigny has devised an exceedingly simple method for showing his interesting experiments on the spheroidal state of fluids. He takes a platinum wire and rolls it into a spiral like the spring of a watch, taking care to depress the central portion. He forms, thus a sort of capsule, or circular and concave gridiron, in which the water is contained when the wire has been previously made red hot. By the repulsion of caloric the water is retained, and forming itself into a spheroid, rolls about without flowing through. Alcohol or ether may be substituted for water; when the vapor escaping takes fire above and below the wire, but the spheroidal drop moves rapidly about with the flame, without undergoing combustion. [Pic.

Repelling Mice from Fruit Trees.—We still often hear of the death of trees by mice girdling. Prevention from this disaster is one of the easiest and most certain things in the world, consisting simply in throwing up a little circular bank or mound of earth round the trunk of each tree, nine or ten inches high. One man will do hundreds in a day, and we have never known a single instance, out of thousands of cases, where it has failed.

Variety.

From observations made by Dr. Scoresby in the spring of 1848, while voyaging from Boston to Liverpool on the steamer Hibernia, and during the prevalence of a heavy northwest gale, it would appear that the largest Atlantic waves have an average height of forty-three feet. The mean distance between each wave was found to be five hundred and fifty-nine feet, and the width from crest to crest six hundred. Sixteen seconds was estimated as the interval of time between two billows, and their velocity per hour was thirty-two and a half miles.

The lady who would become really beautiful must make the cultivation of her mind—of those intellectual and moral powers with which her Creator has endowed her—her first and principal care. Pure affection must be cherished, amiable dispositions encouraged, useful knowledge acquired, and a mild, even, and obliging temper assiduously cultivated, or all her endeavors to obtain real beauty will prove to have been in vain.

A scientific druggist, named Humphreys, a resident of Savannah, Ga., has recently discovered that the peel of sour oranges, if tightly manufactured, produces an alcoholic liquid superior in its character, for chemical purposes, to any in present use; possessing the flavor of the orange, which, together with an addition of a few essential oils, renders it an essential substitute in place of any other preparation for the ladies' toilet.

No man knows what he can do till he is fully resolved to do whatever he can. When men have thought themselves obligated to set about any business in good earnest, they have done that which their indolence made them suppose was impossible. There are several abilities unknown to the possessor, which lie hid in the mind, for want of an occasion to bring them forth.

It will be recollected that Jenny Lind, on her first arrival in New York, made a donation to the Fire Department of three thousand dollars, which was added to the Widow's and Orphan's Fund. The firemen were extremely grateful, and are determined to make her a handsome present before she goes. They are about to request her acceptance of a copy of Audubon's Birds of America, bound in a most beautiful and costly manner.

Some idea of the extent of the great London Fair may be formed from the fact that the privilege of printing the Catalogue has been purchased by the Messrs. Clowes, at a premium of $20,000, in addition to two pence for every copy sold, to be applied towards the expenses of the exhibition. But another will be printed in several languages, and be sold at ten shillings per copy.

Lieut. Marchand, of the U. S. Navy, has brought with him, from Java, a living Upas tree. By his assiduous care it was preserved alive during the long voyage from Batavia, and a few days before the vessel arrived at Norfolk, leaves sprouted forth. It has been presented by Lieut. M. to the National Institute, and can be seen in the new conservatory of that institution, at Washington.

A correspondent of the Boston Courier says that the consumption of cotton by the world is a little over 2,750,000 bales. The United States commonly furnish 2,250,000. Of this, there is consumed at the North, 500,000; by England, 1,050,000; by France, 300,000; by other Europeans, 400,000; leaving to come from other countries, only 500,000.

The quarterly report of the Chief of Police of New York City shows that during the quarter ending Sept. 30, 10,010 persons were arrested, being an increase of 1,786 over the previous quarter; 825 burglaries and larcenies are reported, and 1,030 persons arrested for the same.

A little wrong done to another, is a great wrong done to ourselves. The severest punishment of an injury, is the consciousness of having done it; and no man suffers more than he who is turned over to the pain of repentance.

No man or woman is fully educated if not accustomed to manual labor. Whatever accomplishments they possess, whatever their mental training, a deduction must be made for their ignorance of that important chapter in the world's great book.

It has been estimated that a locomotive runs 150,000 miles before being laid aside as useless; and that the value of one of the best class is about $13,000. At this rate every mile it runs will cost eight and two-thirds cents.

Grapes, in great abundance, and of most excellent quality, are raised in California. In the vineyard of Gen. Tallejo, it is said, the product of a single acre will yield the snug little sum of $25,000.

REMINISCENCES OF DR. CHAS. JAMES STUART.

Geo. B. Utter—Dear Sir,—Several years since, in a conversation which I had with you, Doctor Charles James Stuart was referred to as one who was singular in Edinburgh for holding the views of the Seventh-day Baptists. I intended long ago to have given you some particulars with regard to that gentleman; but my avocation having called me to spend a number of years in traveling, the subject was forgotten, till it was called up recently in conversation with your excellent friend Mr. Stillman. It may be gratifying to you and your brethren to learn some things regarding a man of such high repute as Dr. Stuart, who for many years stood alone on the question which distinguishes your denomination from others. With a view of imparting that pleasure, I shall now give you a few particulars respecting him, from my unaided memory.

Doctor Charles James Stuart's progenitors were related to the Royal Family of Scotland of that name, and he was himself closely connected with several of the nobility of that country. He inherited the estate called Dunearen, and for many years was styled by that estate, as the aristocracy of the old country generally are.

The Doctor was educated for the Established Church, and at an early period was appointed and installed minister of the parish of Cramond, a few miles distant from Edinburgh. This was about the latter part of the last century. There is reason to believe that his views were evangelical, and that he was strictly conscientious. This will appear from the facts which follow.

For several years after his appointment to the ministerial charge of the parish, Dr. Stuart did not administer the rite of christening or the sacrament of the Lord's Supper. When he was brought before the Presbytery or General Assembly on the charge of neglecting or refusing to administer those church ordinances, he assigned as his reason in justification, that the church creeds restricted the ordinance of baptism to the children of believing parents, but that there were no believing parents in his parish. The Lord's Supper, by the same creed, was to be administered only to believers, but he knew of no believer in his parish, except a maiden lady, Miss Moubury.

The Doctor was, I believe, suspended from his charge, for these derelections of duty. He withdrew from his connection with the Church of Scotland, and, following up his inquiries by the investigation of the Word of God, he became a Baptist, and joined the Scotch Baptist Church, under the eldership of Arch. McLean and Mr. Walker. He now, having gone through a regular course of medical study, devoted himself to the practice of medicine, and was long celebrated as a skillful physician, and had extensive practice in the first families of the land. He had not been above three or four years connected with the Baptist Church, when he withdrew from its fellowship on the seventh-day question. During the many subsequent years of his life, he remained in non-fellowship with every church.

But whilst the good Doctor was thus singular, he continued to maintain the happiest Christian intercourse with the pious of various denominations—particularly with the Baptists. He was one of the first who patronized the Baptist Missionary Society of England, and for many years was in the closest intimacy with Andrew Fuller and the other fathers of that mission. No man showed a deeper interest in the mission, or a stronger affection for those venerated and devoted men of God, the missionaries. I well remember, many years ago, when intelligence was received of the dangerous illness of Mr. Fuller, of the Doctor's ordering a post-chaise instanter, and setting off about three hundred miles to see him—traveling night and day till he reached Kettering—where he found Fuller much better. The Doctor reached the house on the Lord's day, while the service was going on in the chapel. Mr. Fuller was keeping house, and engaged in rocking the cradle, while the family were at meeting. When he saw the Doctor enter, he rose, and, holding up his hands, exclaimed, "Doctor Stuart! how great are thy antipathies and thy attachments!" His attachment to Mr. F. was great indeed; so was it to all the missionaries—to Carey, with whom he long corresponded, as well as to Marshman and Ward. I have seen the assiduous attention which he paid to those admirable men when they visited Edinburgh. His hospitable mansion was their home during several of those visits. You may see in Mr. Fuller's printed journals of his travels frequent affectionate references to the Doctor. But he has long since finished his earthly career, and, I doubt not, is enjoying the company of his Redeemer, and the society of those men of God whom he loved so much on earth—aye, the blessed company and fellowship of many with whom he used to be angry while here; for the Doctor had, as Fuller exclaimed, his antipathies as well as his attachments. I suppose it is upwards of twenty-two years since he fell asleep in Jesus, at a good old age of more than seventy years.

Dr. Stuart lived long in matrimony with one of the most pious and benevolent of ladies. Mrs. Stuart was the daughter of the excellent Thomas Erskine, D. D., one of the most eminent of our Scottish divines, whose sermons have long been celebrated for their soundness and piety. The Doctor had two sons and several daughters. His eldest son, James Stuart of Duneaern, has been well known in the political circles, both of Scotland and England. Shortly after his father's death, a political controversy between him and Mr. Boswell of Blackader, a relative of his, led to a duel, in which Mr. Boswell was the victim. This caused a deep sensation throughout Great Britain. Mr. Stuart appeared to take his trial before the high court of Justiciary. The trial was long, and deeply interesting. It resulted in his honorable (?) acquittal. He subsequently spent about two years in the United States, and wrote an interesting account of his journeys, which was published in two 8vo. volumes. On his return to England, he became editor of the "London Courier," at a salary of £1,500 per annum. He has long been the proprietor of that paper, I believe, and has had several important appointments under Government. The Doctor's oldest daughter I well remember. She was for years a member of the same church with which I was connected, and was an excellent lady. Another of his daughters was married to John Burnett, Esq., of Kemney, in Aberdeenshire. That gentleman of opulence became pious at an early age, and was baptized and joined the same little church in Edinburgh in which your correspondent spent many years.

In conclusion, I would farther state, that Doctor Stuart was considered to be a man of superior talent and learning. As a Hebraist and biblical critic, he was not, perhaps, surpassed by many, if by any, in the country. He was very benevolent, and was possessed of ample means to exercise his benevolence. He was strictly aristocratic—probably too much so. He could not brook to be approached by his poor Christian brethren except with (as he thought) becoming deference—any thing like forwardness he repelled. But, on the other hand, where he saw in any, however poor, a proper sense and manifestation of respectful regard for superiors, no one was more kind and affable than he. In this country those distinctions are not much regarded. It is well that it is so. Yours fraternally, J. F.

SYSTEMATIC CONTRIBUTIONS.

Contributions prompted by the spirit of benevolence, in order to produce the good intended, should be systematic. Nature, reason, and revelation, affirm the truth of this proposition. Order is one of the first laws of nature; through all her variety uniformity appears. Day and night regularly alternate. The seasons follow each other in orderly succession. Seed-time and harvest, infancy, youth, manhood, and old age, come and go according to certain settled and systematic laws. Trees and plants grow from little but regular accretions. Rivers have a never-failing flow only as fed by perennial springs. Lakes, clear and pure, sparkling in the light or trembling in the breeze, are fed by little rills and hidden fountains; and old Ocean owes its steady fullness to the contributions of numberless rivers. Man pines and dies without regular food, and sleep, and exercise. His intellect needs systematic training and culture. Reading, studying, and thinking, should be systematic; and he who undertakes either without order, will most assuredly fail to accomplish much, or to develop his intellect thoroughly and properly. The farmer that thrives manages his farm according to some system. The thrifty mechanic has order in his business. The professional man does not succeed well without a methodical attention to his profession. Religion does not thrive well in the soul of him who devotes to it only the odd ends of time. That individual who enjoys large supplies of heavenly grace and love, is one who makes religion the chief and regular every-day concern of life.

Analogy would thus seem to teach, that benevolent enterprises will thrive best with systematic arrangements. System in contributions gives that order and regularity so essential in all departments of labor—in all enterprises—so essential throughout all the operations of nature.

System tends to form habit. It is the frequent and stated repetition of an action which forms a habit respecting that action. An individual, by adopting and pursuing a systematic plan of contributing, will very soon have a habit formed that will be a kind of second nature, which will not only make it very easy for him to bestow his accustomed contributions, but will also make it unnatural, and consequently difficult, for him to neglect them; hence, what he first did as a duty, will at length be performed both as a duty and as a pleasure. What is given, at first, by a contracted or untrained spirit, with much grumbling and squirming, will, after long practice, be given with true satisfaction. The most shriveled, niggardly, miserly soul can, by a long process of training in benevolent acts, be expanded into just, fair and symmetrical proportions. The naturally generous will, under such a system, become still more munificent. Such a habit is needed as a counteracting principle—a regulator of the desires and scrambling after filthy lucre. If benevolence should obtain possession of the soul, it could not long retain that place against the worldly maxims and habits of money-getting so widely diffused throughout all the operations of life, without acts of charity repeated sufficiently frequent to form a habit. It is needed, not only to withstand, but to kill out, the spirit of covetousness, so deeply rooted in the human heart.

Systematic contributions will make a safe and noble channel into which can flow such stray pence, loose sixpences, and odd shillings, as would, very probably, without some such channel, glide away in useless or worse than useless superfluities, that would eat into the moral vitals, like a living canker, or a putrid gangrene; or, if hoarded up, would produce a rust and corrosion, to gnaw at the heart-strings through the endless ages of eternity. Every individual needs some such outlet for the loose change which he is in continual danger of spending in things that do not add to the real, substantial happiness, either of himself or others. It will lead him to look well to the state and responsibilities of his stewardship. It will tend to cultivate systematic economy; that is, the man who has some rule or principle about his giving, will have some about his saving. He will endeavor to lop off the superfluous branches of his expenditures, and bring them down to gospel principles; for prodigality is anti-gospel as well as parsimoniousness. At the same time, it makes the acquisition of property not the end of life, but only a means for glorifying God and blessing the world.

Systematic contributions will create more attention to the wants of the world, leading to a careful and prayerful study of its condition. This study will leave an impress on the mind, that will act as a reflex influence, tending to make a more liberal and cheerful giver. This will make the soul thus influenced more prosperous and happy—will lend energy, decision, and enterprise to character; for no great theme, no noble purpose, takes possession of the mind without inspiring it with life, vigor, and perseverance before unknown to it.

Missionary enterprises are all demanding unceasing supplies. They cannot be varied or postponed to accommodate loose, irregular methods of giving. The only way by which their continued demands can be met, is by systematic donations. Such donations will not only furnish the pecuniary aid needed, but will also tend to create a prayerful spirit on the part of those sending out the missionaries. Where an individual is devoting a regular portion of the sweat of his brow—the toil of his hands—to bless the world, it would be almost a miracle if the breathings of earnest prayer should not continually ascend from his heart in behalf of those for whose welfare he is so ardently laboring. There is a double blessing accompanying every benevolent act—a blessing both to the giver and to the receiver. Who ever saw a truly benevolent man perishing through want and neglect, or his children begging bread? He is also laying up treasures in the world to come. Do you, in the name of a disciple, feed one "just perishing for want of bread?" Your soul will be fed with heavenly manna. Do you give a cup of water to the thirsty? You will be made to drink of that well whereof drinking you will never thirst more. Are you clothing the naked? You are preparing for yourself an eternal robe of righteousness. Are you ministering to the wants of the sick, afflicted, imprisoned? You are fitting yourself for the kingdom prepared for you from the foundation of the world. Where there is system, each gift need not necessarily be large; yet it should be as large as consistent with the means of the giver, and often repeated. The hope of the world rests upon those not blessed with princely fortunes. It is by mites that the richest gifts are added to the treasury of the Lord. From the perennial springs of devout, benevolent hearts, gush the little streams, which, mingling in one mighty river, bear upon their united bosoms the glad tidings of salvation to nations sitting in darkness.

The Bible plainly sets forth the duty of active, systematic benevolence, and the rewards accompanying it. Abraham gave tithes of all to Melchizedeck. Jacob vowed at Bethel to give a tenth of all the Lord should give unto him. It is supposed that a devout and benevolent Hebrew, in carrying out the requirements of his religion, gave at least one third of his income. The early Christians at Jerusalem sold their possessions, and distribution was made to every man as he had need. "Freely ye have received, freely give." "Sell that ye have, and give alms." "Let every one lay by him in store, as the Lord hath prospered him." "It is more blessed to give than to receive." "Cast thy bread upon the waters; for thou shalt find it after many days." "The liberal deviseth liberal things, and by liberal things shall he stand." "God loveth a cheerful giver." "He that hath a bountiful eye shall be blessed." "Take heed and beware of covetousness." "Give, and it shall be given unto you; good measure, pressed down, and shaken together, and running over, shall men give into your bosom." These, and many other passages, set this subject in its true light before the mind of the humble inquirer after duty. The conclusions derived from the above, are plain and easily applied. We should cultivate it for the influence it will have upon others—for the benefit of the world—for the glory of God. We should make a prayerful consecration of certain portions of our income for benevolent purposes. Churches and benevolent societies should receive the contributions of their members at regular intervals (extraordinaries excepted) and according to some systematic plan. The youth should be trained, in their early years, to weekly or monthly contributions, if it were no more than a penny a week or a penny per month; so that the seeds of benevolence may be sown and take root ere opposite tendencies have found a lodgment in their minds. If right principles, and the methods naturally growing therefrom, were adopted by the church of Christ, her members would act as faithful stewards of the Lord, distributing bountifully what they have bountifully received, not leaving the Lord's treasures to pampered and spoiled children, over which they may carp and quarrel; while, by such a course, all plans and objects of benevolence would receive ample support, without the pleading and begging of agents and friends, and the streams of salvation would soon flow plentifully for the cleansing of the nations. DEATH IN HIGH STATION.

The glories of our mortal state
Are shadows, not substantial things;
There is no armor against fate;
Death lays his icy hand on kings.
Sceptre and crown
Must tumble down,
And in the dust be equal made
With the poor crooked scythe and spade.

Some men with swords may reap the field,
And plant fresh laurels where they kill;
But their strong nerves at last must yield,
They tame but one another still.
Early or late,
They stoop to fate,
And must give up their conquering breath,
When they, pale captives, creep to death.

The garlands wither on your brow;
Then boast no more your mighty deeds;
Upon death's purple altar now,
See where the victor-victim bleeds!
All heads must come
To the cold tomb.
Only the actions of THE JUST
Smell sweet and blossom in the dust.

THE DEATH OF NEANDER.

The Rev. A. McLaren, of Southampton, England, has translated and abridged from the German the following sketch of the closing hours of Neander's Life. The publication from which the account is derived is a small pamphlet written by Licentiate Rauh, who appears to have been an eye-witness of the affecting scene which he describes.

The inexorable disease that was to rend Neander from us, began with another of the innumerable and constantly recurring instances of his burning, self-sacrificing faithfulness to his calling. He had for some time been compelled to increased care of his health by gout, but had always thrown it aside under the pressure of duty. Just so now. For although he had been laboring under the premonitory symptoms of approaching disease, nothing could persuade him to allow the uncertain and trying weather to interrupt his lectures. In the middle of his prelection, his weakened, almost inaudible voice, failed him at times—a thing which from his iron strength of will had never before happened. He, however, forced himself to persevere to the end of the lecture; but could scarcely manage, even with the help of some of his students, to come down the steps of his chair, and went home completely worn out. A listener to this last lecture, was so terror-struck with these sad signs that he whispered to the person sitting next him, "That is our Neander's last lecture."

The hour for resuming study after his quickly dispatched or rather scarcely-tasted dinner, had hardly arrived, when the amanuensis, whom the disease of his eyes, which had latterly amounted almost to blindness, had lately rendered necessary, was obliged by him to go on with his work. After a little he continued, although with interruptions from increasing weakness, dictating his Church History for three consecutive hours. About five o'clock the symptoms of dangerous illness appeared, but he could not be persuaded to leave his occupation, but after the necessary interruption, went on with the sentence he had begun. He put aside his watchful and foreboding sister with affectionate impatience, and when she would not cease, said to her, as if discomposed, "Let me alone. Any day-laborer can work if he likes; will you not let me do it?"

But about seven o'clock the long-forgotten claims of nature compelled attention, and he allowed, although he himself did not wish, his amanuensis to withdraw. His first thought was not to alarm his anxious sister. He therefore called her to his bedside, and taking her hand, said, "Do not be uneasy, Hannah dear, this is only transient; I know my constitution." The doctors who were called, however, (and who were, in addition to his fast friend and usual physician, who did not leave his bedside all night long, another celebrated practitioner, and the King's own surgeon,) were agreed in thinking that the worst was to be apprehended. They were able to subdue the violent diarrhœa which was a symptom of the disease; and love, ready to believe the best, eagerly snatched at this slight hold for hope.

He had scarcely recovered his breathing after the first violent attack next morning, when he asked, in a tone of touching pathos, "Shall I then not be able to lecture to-day?" He expressly desired that his lecture should be announced as postponed "for to-day only; next day he would certainly be able for it." On Tuesday afternoon he asked impatiently for his amanuensis, and was anxious to get on with the book with which he had been last occupied, (Ritter's Palestine;) he was vexed with and blamed the care of his friends who had sent him away too soon. He then had the newspapers read to him, according to his custom, by another of his students, and listened interestedly, making remarks and selecting what he wished to hear. An overpowering sleep closed the day's work.

The alleviation produced by a night's rest wakened next day our almost dying hopes. The first effect on the patient of a new glimmer of life, was an earnest request to the doctor for permission to rise. The confidence had not left him that his unconquerable will, which had so often overpowered the pressure of physical wants, could still exercise its power. But next night brought a convulsive hiccough, the ordinary herald of inevitable departure. Still the soul which had by long habit gained the power of bidding the storms of bodily life peace in the name of the Lord, continued clear and bright. He evidently knew every one about him; and with that touching humility which had long been the festal robe of his royal spirit, gently put aside the assistance of those for whom he could not bear that their love to him should disturb their daily duties.

Friday night destroyed the last hope. Paralysis, the form in which the sequelæ of his weakening disease showed themselves, seized the kidneys, and the ominous hiccough broke in on his short slumbers. He prayed with a touching, weak voice, which filled every eye with tears, "O God! that I could sleep." The Lord heard his prayer above his thoughts.

The next day, Saturday—a day of terrible agony—did not pass without a gleam of the majesty whose brightness for our eyes is quenched now. The more oppressive the pain, the greater his anxiety to be able to rise, as if in that he would have a pledge of strength for his holy calling. He imperatively commanded his servant to bring his clothes that he might rise. The dissuasions of a dutiful student who was present only interrupted the wish for a moment. It was only his sister who could alter his resolution by saying imploringly to him, "Dear Augustus, remember what you said to me when I opposed the doctor's orders, 'It comes from God, and so we must cheerfully bow to it.'" "That is true," he said, his voice suddenly calmed, "it does come from God—all—and we are bound to thank him for it."

A few hours later the physicians determined to strengthen and arrest for a moment the dying life by a last desperate measure. A bath of wine and strengthening herbs procured him at last the pleasure of being able to rise. It strikes one as significant that he was carried from the little dark room where he had been suffering, to the sunlit apartment that had been for twenty years the witness of his untiring labor for the kingdom of God. He drank in with thirsty gaze the full golden light after which he had always yearned.

As if at the end of a long journey, he murmured dreamingly, but with prophetic truth, "I am weary, let us get ready to go home." But the sight of the familiar study, and of the noble souls who spoke to him in whispers from the shelves, put back the desire for final rest. Lifting himself with strong effort from the pillows, he commenced in regular diction a lecture on New Testament exegesis. Then a new image passed before his restless spirit, the future of his theological school, which lay near his heart. He called for the reading of an essay on a subject given out a short time before—"The Material and Formal Principles of the Reformation." And then, as if he would by persevering, heroic struggle, wring the impossible from nature, he dictated the title of the course of prelections he intended to deliver next Semester,—"The Gospel of John, considered from its true Historical Standpoint." And at last, as the first moment of his life for sacred science had been directed to exhibiting a mirrored image of all the glory which the Spirit of Christ in past ages had wrought, his last thoughts, in the midst of the phantasies of the decisive struggle, were devoted to this, the work of his life. Going on from the precise point in his ecclesiastical history which he had reached before his illness, he sketched in general outlines the peculiar opposing tendencies and related movements that appeared to the community of the so-called "Friends of God" in the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries. "So much for the general features,"—thus he closed his dictation—"the further development of them follows." Having thus reached the end of a section, he asked the time; they told him half-past nine. "I am weary," he repeated; "I wish to sleep now." And whilst he was laid down by friends' hands on his bed for his last sleep, he whispered, with that love-breathing expression which thrilled the hearers through bone and marrow, "Good night." Then, as if God would give us a sign that the struggle so agonizing was purposed only to lead to as unbroken a rest, he slept for four hours continuously, receiving the literal answer of the prayer that the agonies of disease had drawn from him, and only the slowly and more slowly drawn breath betrayed that a living man was falling in sleep into that realm which we short-sighted mortals call death.

NOTHING GREAT BUT GOD.

When Massilon, says Dr. Hamilton, pronounced one of those discourses which have placed him in the first class of orators, he found himself surrounded by the trappings and pageants of a royal funeral. The temple was not only hung with sable, but shadowed with darkness, save the few twinkling lights of the altar. The beauty and chivalry of the land were spread out before him. The censers threw forth their fumes of incense, mounting in wreaths to the gilded dome. There sat majesty, clothed in sackcloth and sunk in grief. All felt in common and as one. It was a breathless suspense. Not a sound stole upon the awful stillness. The master of mighty eloquence arose. His hands were folded on his breast. His eyes were lifted to Heaven. Utterance seemed denied him. He stood abstracted and lost. At length his fixed look was unbent; it hurried over the scene, where every pomp was mingled and every trophy strewn. It found no resting-place for itself amid all that mocking vanity. Again it settled; it had fastened on the bier, glittering with escutcheons and veiled with plumes. A sense of the indescribable nothingness of man "at his best estate," of the meanness of the highest human grandeur, now made plain in the spectacle of that hearsed mortal, overcame him. His eye once more closed; his action was suspended, and in a scarcely audible whisper, he broke the long-drawn pause—"There is nothing great but God!"

POLITICS—THE CHURCH AND THE PULPIT.

As to the political rights of ministers and the province of the pulpit with regard to political affairs, our own sentiments are fully expressed in these eloquent paragraphs from the pen of Dr. Skinner:—

"It has been questioned whether Christians, and especially ministers of the Gospel, should not stand aloof from all political contests, and either not vote at elections, or conceal their votes, so that their preference among rival candidates for office shall not be known. But it is a purely selfish and time-serving prudence which ordinarily suggests this course. There may be rare occasions, when reserve and even inaction may be demanded; and our moderation and equanimity should always be exemplary; but the cause of our country is in all respects too important, and especially too closely connected with the interests of religion, to permit any one who is controlled by principle and the spirit of the Gospel, to be, in common cases, either negative or unknown, in the influence which he exerts. Shall the interests of the nation be abandoned to the blind and headlong action of partizan zeal?

"Though the Church in this land be separate from the State, there is no power which can be brought into action in favor of the nation's happiness, equal to that of the Pulpit. The energies of this divine means of every good to man, are greatly increased with us, by its disconnection from all civil advantages and aids. If it receive no support, it is under no obligations but those of love. If it stand alone, yet it is independent and free; while there is no place near or remote, no person high or low, no subject-matter, whether of politics, legislation, morals, religion, science, or art, to which it may not boldly apply its appropriate influence, under protection of the government, so long as it violates no one's civil rights."

THE MOTHER OF LORD BYRON.

Lord Byron was afflicted with a club foot, and when young he submitted to some very painful operations to have the deformity removed, but with no success. His mother was a proud, passionate, and wicked woman, and even the yearning of natural affection seemed stifled. There is no good proof that her son naturally had a worse disposition than other children, but there was in him a great power for good or evil, waiting only to be quickened into life. Let us see the influence his mother exerted on this brilliant and powerful mind.

The readers of Byron's life must have shuddered to hear him speak of his mother. Moore, the biographer of Byron, speaks three times of this fact, and the passages are so remarkable that I will transcribe them literally. The first is brief, but significant:—

"On the subject of his deformed foot, Byron described the feeling of horror and humiliation that came over him when his mother, in one of her fits of passion, called him a lame brat!"

The second passage is scarcely less significant:—

"But in the case of Lord Byron, disappointment met him at the very threshold of life. His mother, to whom his affections first naturally and with ardor turned, either repelled them rudely, or capriciously trifled with them. In speaking of his early days to a friend at Genoa, a short time before his departure for Greece, he traced his first feelings of pain and humiliation to the coldness with which his mother had received his caresses in infancy, and the frequent taunts on his personal deformity with which she wounded him."

This passage is only excelled in dreadfulness by the following:—

"He had spoken of his mother to Lord Sligo, and with a feeling that seemed little short of aversion. 'Some time or other,' said Byron, 'I will tell you why I thus feel towards her.' A few days after, when they were bathing together in the Gulf Lepanto, he referred to his promise, and pointing to his naked leg, exclaimed, 'Look there! it is to her false delicacy at my birth I owe that deformity; and yet, as long as I can remember, she has never ceased to taunt and reproach me with it. Even a few days before we parted for the last time, on my leaving England, she, in one of her fits of passion, uttered an imprecation on me, praying that I might prove as ill-formed in mind as I am in body!' His look and manner, in relating the frightful circumstance, can only be conceived by those who have seen him in a similar state of excitement."

What an imprecation from the lips of a woman, and that woman a mother! "Praying that I might prove as ill-shapen in mind as I am in body!" The prayer was more than answered. Misanthrope, libertine, with all his giant powers, he became shockingly "ill-formed in mind." His pen is the vehicle of gall and bitterness. His most brilliant works are immersed in pollution. He has written a work which lies on the table of the prostitute. The son of such a mother has furnished abandoned women a book, at which, as a fountain, thousands have drunk and perished.

Ah! mothers work close up to the fountain of life. Mothers may make Byrons or Paysons, devils or angels. They can, with Divine assistance, make their offspring a fold of Christ's lambs, or, with Satan's assistance, a den of vipers. [N. Y. Evangelist.

New York, December 12, 1850.

Proclamation,

By HAMILTON FISH, Governor of the State of N. Y

The mercies of an all-kind Providence call for an acknowledgment of gratitude and of dependence from the creatures of his bounties.

The year which is about to close has been marked by innumerable blessings to us as a Nation. Abundant harvest and profitable labor have brought rich rewards to honest industry. Peace and tranquility are established at home; and no discord disturbs our relations abroad. Health, prosperity, and abundance, have been freely vouchsafed to us. Civil and religious liberty prevail throughout the length and breadth of the land. And to us all is secured the free exercise of the worship of their Creator according to their own faith. And on this occasion we should not forget, that while an inscrutable Providence has seen fit to remove during the past year the Chief Magistrate of our Union, that same Providence has preserved us under the trial a free and united People, has saved us from anarchy or civil commotion, and has continued to us the mild operation of a Government of our own adoption and rulers of our own choice.

I do, therefore, designate and recommend THURSDAY, THE TWELFTH DAY OF DECEMBER NEXT, to be observed by the good People of this State as a day of Public Thanksgiving to Almighty God.

In witness whereof I have hereunto subscribed my name and affixed the Privy Seal of the State, [L. S.] at the City of Albany, the 31st day of October, one thousand eight hundred and fifty.

By the Governor, HAMILTON FISH.
ROBERT H. MORRIS, Private Secretary.

BRING IN THE TITHES.

The duty of Christians to dedicate their property, as well as their persons, to the Lord, is so clearly presented in the Scriptures, that we wonder how any one can fail to perceive it. It is, however, a fact, that many persons make profession of religion under the impression that their entire duty will be discharged by leading moral lives, spending a portion of their time in devotional exercises, attending to the public ordinances of the church, and occasionally doling out a few spare pennies to help forward some good cause. They appear not to recognize the duty of serving God with all that they have. But what saith the law? "Honor the Lord with thy substance, and with the first fruits of all thine increase." Prov. 3: 9. The word of God, if we understand it, recognizes the property which a man actually has in possession, or the business which he follows as the means of acquiring property, as an instrumentality by which the cause of God may be carried forward in the earth; and he who does not, for this purpose, use all the instrumentalities at his command, fails to serve the Lord "with all his strength," as enjoined in "the first and great commandment." He pretends to yield himself entirely to Christ, but, in reality, holds back a part, yes, a very large part, of his strength, the acquisition of property being that to which his time and powers are, for the most part, consecrated.

But as a certain portion of a man's earnings is required for the maintenance of himself and his own household, it becomes a nice point to determine how much he may use in this way, without incurring the guilt of living to himself rather than to Him who died for him and rose again. Of a thousand dollars, for example, earned by a Christian in the course of a year, what portion may he use for the support and comfort of his family? and what portion ought he to contribute for purposes of benevolence? It may not be easy to give such a reply as will meet every case; for one man may earn a thousand dollars, and not require the half of it to meet all the reasonable wants of himself and his dependents, while another may require eight or nine hundred dollars per annum for family expenses. Of course the latter, who contributes but a hundred dollars for benevolent purposes, is as free from selfishness as the former, who contributes five hundred. We believe that, as a general rule, the practice of consecrating a tenth part of our substance to the Lord comes very near to the amount required of us. This was directly enjoined upon the Israelites under the law. It was also recognized by the pious as a duty, long before the giving of the law. Said the good old patriarch Jacob, "If God will be with me, and will keep me in this way that I go; and will give me bread to eat, and raiment to put on, so that I come again to my father's house in peace; then shall the Lord be my God: and this stone, which I have set for a pillar, shall be God's house; and of all that thou shalt give me I will surely give the tenth unto thee." Gen. 28: 20—22. We see no reason why this duty should be considered as obsolete under the gospel.

What seems to be important is, that there should be, on the part of every Christian, a distinct recognition of his indebtedness to God for the property entrusted to him, and some habit cultivated, which shall tend to keep alive in his heart a sense of the obligation devolved upon him to make his property an instrumentality of good to mankind. When a man borrows a sum of money from another, the interest which he pays for the use of it is a distinct recognition of his indebtedness to his creditor; and the practice of paying this interest from time to time, as it becomes due, tends to keep alive in him a sense of his indebtedness. If he becomes careless in this practice, it is a pretty sure mark that the sense of obligation to his creditor has become weakened; and lest it should die out entirely, and amount to a repudiation of the claim, his creditor will be very apt to jog his memory by some process of law. God has lent to every man the property which he possesses. Ought he not to acknowledge his indebtedness by paying a regular interest for the same? What would better tend to keep alive a sense of his indebtedness, and of his obligation to use all in such a way as will best promote the interests and glory of the great Creator? If he pays his neighbor interest for money loaned him, much more ought he to pay his Maker. "Will a man rob God?" Yet there are professors of religion, who owe the Lord hundreds and thousands of dollars, interest money, which ought to have been paid long ago. Reader, "how much owest thou unto my Lord?"

A failure to recognize and act upon this principle, is what renders it so difficult to raise money for any good purpose. If we call upon our brethren for funds to promote the missionary cause, it is exceedingly difficult to obtain them. Their own wants are so numerous that they have nothing to spare. If we wish to circulate tracts, or send the Bible to the destitute, they have nothing to spare. They "must attend to their own wants"—"charity begins at home"—and "he that provideth not for his own, hath denied the faith, and is worse than an infidel." Thus, and by a thousand other flimsy pretenses, they contrive to evade their obligation to the cause of God, and keep an eye constantly to their own interests. Now we believe, that if the Christian would begin right, and manage systematically, there would be no difficulty in raising money for the cause of God. Why should he not, when setting out in business, recognize it as a first principle, that what he has, has been lent by the Lord? Why not at once resolve to pay a regular percentage of interest for the use of it? Why not come under a solemn vow, as did Jacob, "Of all that thou shalt give me I will surely give the tenth to thee?" What is there to hinder a man, who makes a thousand dollars a year, from saying, "Nine hundred shall suffice for the wants of myself and family, and the rest shall be holy to the Lord?" Why should not a farmer, who raises one hundred bushels of wheat, consecrate ten of them to the Lord? Why should not the merchant, who makes ten dollars by his sales, set apart one for the cause of God? If Christians would all act upon this principle, they would always be ready to take hold and help when a good cause is presented to them. Each person might have his box, or chest, or drawer, where he could lay aside his tithe-offerings; and when the missionary cause, or any other good cause, made a demand upon him, he could go and see at once whether there was any thing to spare. This box should be called "Holiness to the Lord," and it should be accounted sacrilege to abstract any thing from it for selfish purposes. But Christians generally fail to act on this principle. Not one in ten, perhaps not one in a hundred, does it. Alas! "all seek their own, not the things which are Jesus Christ's."

BRITISH CORRESPONDENCE—No. 22.

GLASGOW, November 21, 1850.

The outcry against the Papal Bull continues here with little abatement. Church and State have spoken out. Not only the Prime Minister, but the Queen herself, is alledged to have given expression to her indignation. And the Church, both as Established, and those dissenting alike from the principle and the practice of that Establishment, has with wonderful unanimity denounced the intruder. Bishops, in charges to their clergy; and Ministers, in addresses to their people, have decided against fraternizing with the arch-apostate, or allowing him farther influence amongst us. In public meetings, the Bull has been taken by the horns; and the Queen and her Government have been solicited to put in force the powers with which they are armed to rid us of the emissaries of a foreign potentate, seeking to subvert our prized liberty. Not merely our newspapers and other vehicles of general opinion, but even our law journals, have deemed the circumstances of the case sufficiently grave to justify their turning up the musty statutes of a former age, and pointing to warrants for resisting papal encroachments. Lord Wellington has publicly been called to redeem the pledge he gave at the passing of the Bill for "Catholic Emancipation," that if the Romish party should misconduct themselves in the enjoyment of the privileges thereby conferred, he should move its repeal.

Notwithstanding, however, of all this zeal, it is not to be denied, that our Government has been coqueting with the Church of Rome; and the results are only what might well have been foreseen. The spiritual instruction of benighted Ireland had been neglected, while ecclesiastical benefices were conferred as rewards for political favors. The power of the priests over an enslaved people raised a cry for favors, under the name of "emancipation;" and the boon was conferred, under promise, and in the belief, that clamor would thereby be suppressed. Instead of this, however, a wily and unscrupulous priesthood had discovered the sure means of progressive advancement; and, by many machinations, have plied successfully the crooked policy sanctioned by their Church for the attainment of its ends. Agitation has been kept alive from year to year, as the means of extorting farther favors; and these have been granted in the vain hope that agitation would be discountenanced and suppressed. Not only has the grant to their College of Maynooth been increased, more effectually enabling Rome to train a priesthood for her purposes, but giving even to that priesthood countenance in their unscriptural doctrines, by excluding texts of Scripture from the lesson-books introduced into the more general schools of Ireland. All this, at home, was accompanied by greater favors abroad. Not only has the popish hierarchy been acknowledged in the colonies, but her priesthood has been pensioned by the British Crown. I speak not merely of the Canadas—in which, in Lower Canada, at least, the French origin of the settlement has features of palliation—but in New Zealand, more recently, prelates and priests are maintained from the public funds; and in other of the colonies also. Our country seems to have forgot, that Rome claims to be infallible, and hoped by favors conferred to win or receive privileges which Rome never gives. As God's Vicegerent, the Pope will be content with nothing less than absolute and universal sway—over the souls and bodies of men. For the attainment of this, every thing will be done and every thing be dared. The unhallowed end is pursued by the most immoral means. Overbearing in the exercise of power, the Papacy can yet fawn and feign for the acquisition of that power. Her history should have formed more a study with our rulers, ere they began the conferment of their favors. They would then have known, that however meek in humility, and however ready to promise well, "no faith with heretics" is a fundamental point of the Romish faith.

Cunning as the serpent, without the harmlessness of the dove, the Pope must, indeed, have supposed that his rescript was well-timed. Not only has he been called to receive into his deadly embrace many of the Episcopal priesthood, and some of her nobility, within the last few years, but the very titles with which he now seeks to dignify England, already grace the sister Kingdom; and although he was not ignorant that Ireland was more a papal country, yet the rulers of England, he was aware, had fully acknowledged by name and title—even in Acts of Parliament and in the Viceregal Courts—the Archbishop and Bishops whom he had appointed to keep Ireland under the Roman yoke. In the circumstances, indeed, we are compelled to consider the demonstrations now so universally made as much misplaced. We say not this from more favor or less fear of the insidiousness of the enemy. We have much hatred of her ways, and much dread of their success. But looking at the past history of our dealings with the Church of Rome, more ample confession of our own sin and folly, would better become both Church and State. The Pope has been perfectly consistent with himself and with his creed. History abundantly exhibits his arrogance and the means resorted to for its gratification. The "infallibility" of Rome stands in the way of all amendment and repentance. Her subtilty, even, is the same; while no disregard of rectitude in the prosecution of her purposes can now exceed that exhibited in former times.

True repentance, however, as regards the dishonor done to God and his cause, is little exhibited in the present Protestant movement. The fear of encroachment on our political liberty has been mainly insisted upon in speeches made and resolutions adopted; it has seemed rather as a question between the Queen's supremacy and the Pope's supremacy, rather than the dread of souls being entangled in the snare of the devil. The Bishops have chiefly seen the audacity of "ignoring the Church of England, as if it had no existence," by a church claiming to be the only true church. The very thing which is right as done by them, they seem to regard as wrong when done by Rome. The Bishop of London, in his late charge to his clergy, having spoken of the necessity now of abstaining from papal practices, naming some of these, a clergyman inquired in writing, whether the Bishop meant to discountenance the use of auricular confession and absolution altogether? To this the Bishop replies, "When I spoke of auricular confession being used as a means of grace, I supposed that every one would understand me to mean the Roman practice, and not that which is recognized as useful and salutary by our own church." And at the Church of St. Barnabas, Pimlico, within his diocese, where the greatest conformity to papal practices has been exhibited, the presiding clergyman last Sunday exhorted certain of his people to have recourse to confession—leading, as it did, to a complete riot, for the suppression of which a large constabulary force was called into requisition. Against these practices in the Church of England, a few of the resolutions recently adopted have been pointed, while condemning the papal aggression; but great jealousy seems to exist among the more zealous of the Episcopalians, lest, in condemning Rome, Protestants should discover and avow that the Church of England herself needs a new Reformation. To this we have hope, however, the agitation may in some measure lead.

Cardinal Wiseman, the pseudo Archbishop, has just published a lengthened defense of the papal measure, characterized by great ability and tact, but without bringing a single new feature, or making any of the revelations by which his party were promising that Lord John Russell should be made ashamed. He does, however, consistently enough, point to the inconsistency of which I have spoken. It is written in the style which Rome adopts when seeking power, but it makes no confession of any error Rome has ever committed, or promise of amendment of wrong Rome has ever done. This is what is most wanted—but what will never honestly be granted.

FAREWELL MISSIONARY MEETING.—In New York, on the evening of the 2d inst., an interesting meeting was held as a farewell to eight male and female missionaries of the American Missionary Association, who are about to sail for Africa, to join the mission at Kaw Mendi. Lewis Tappan, Esq., presided, and gave a brief statement of the history of the Society and the origin and success of the Mendi mission. The Society now has in its employ 13 persons connected with the Mendi mission, 13 in the Island of Jamaica, 17 among the Indians in Minnesota, 7 in Canada, 2 in the Sandwich Islands, 6 in Siam, and above 20 in the Home Field, making 80 in all. The names of the persons now about to go forth are—Rev. Mr. Tefft and Mrs. Tefft, of Ohio; Mrs. Joanna Alden, of Massachusetts; Miss Hannah Moore, formerly among the Chrokees; Mr. W. B. Brown, son of a slaveholder of Louisiana; Rev. Mr. Arnold and wife, of Ohio; Mr. Gray, from Oberlin.

THE MUTILATED TEN COMMANDMENTS.

To the Editors of the Sabbath Recorder:—

In the "New York Baptist Register" of the 7th ult., I noticed a short article headed "Errors of Luther," in which Mr. Oncken is represented as having said, in an address before the Edinburgh Bible Society, that "one of the extraordinary weaknesses of Luther was, that he received and maintained the mutilated Ten Commandments adopted by the Church of Rome."

"Why was it," said he, "that on the Continent there was nothing of that respect for the Lord's day which prevails in this land? Just because the Fourth Commandment had been wrested from their hands. There was not a vestige of it left, even in the Lutheran Catechism. The Sabbath day on the Continent is abused for the worst of purposes. It is on that day especially that Satan gathers in his harvest of souls. The temples of pleasure are filled to excess, as are the temples of sin and open prostitution—sanctioned by law—and all because the day was never fairly and fully established in Germany. The Sabbath only lasts during the two or three hours while the minister is in the pulpit; as soon as he is down the ordinary business and traffic is resumed. In the Augsburg Confession it is stated that the Sabbath is abrogated."

It is not Luther and his followers, and the Romanists, alone, that have fallen into the great "error" of mutilating the ten commandments, but Baptists in America have virtually done the same thing. There are now very many among them, (and probably the proportionate number was formerly much greater,) who believe and teach that the Sabbath Law, contained in the Fourth Commandment, has been abrogated. Many years ago it was common, I think, to ask candidates for ordination among the Baptists, "Do you keep the Lord's day in obedience to the Fourth Commandment, or by virtue of Apostolic example?" And frequently the answer was, "By virtue of Apostolic example." More than twenty years ago Elder Aaron Perkins, a Baptist minister in the State of New York, published a sermon on Acts 20: 7, extracts from which were printed in the "Baptist Register" of Sept. 11th, 1829, and the three following numbers, in which the preacher maintained that the Sabbath of the fourth commandment was a 'typical institution of the Jewish dispensation,' and consequently not binding upon men under the Gospel dispensation, and which had some influence to persuade me that it was not wrong to work on any day. The sermon was approved by the editor of the "Register," and said to be in accordance with the views of the "Baptists." See Bap. Reg. Sept. 11, 1829. Said he:—

"We are not able to perceive, that a command to observe the seventh day can be a command to observe the first day of the week, and we think there is no necessity of sustaining the observance of the Lord's day by an absurd and violent outrage upon language. If the Sabbath is to be observed by virtue of the fourth command, then it is the seventh day that we are to regard, and all the theological heads in the world (in the view of sober sense) cannot make the seventh day the first."

Were not Elder Perkins, and "Brother Beebee," and many others of the Baptists, in 1829, guilty of the "error" of mutilating the ten commandments— And are not all Baptists who teach the same view now alike guilty? True, they do not leave the words of the commandment out of their printed Bibles, but they have taught that it has no binding force, so that there are but nine commandments in reality! And did Luther do any thing worse? Have these men forgotten that their Divine Master said:—"Whosoever shall break one of these least commandments, and shall teach men so, shall be called the least in the kingdom of Heaven?" Matt. 5: 19. Why are they not afraid thus to take away from the Book of God? But there are many Baptists at the present time, and I conclude Mr. Oncken is one of them, who maintain that the first day of the week is the Christian Sabbath—that the fourth commandment is perpetually binding—and that the observance of the first day is obedience to this command. They present no "thus saith the Lord," to show that the law has been amended, but only assertion and uncertain inferences. They say much about "Apostolic example." But what right had the Apostles to amend the law, when it was no part of their Lord's mission to take away so much as one "jot or tittle of the law?" Besides, who can prove from the sacred record, that the disciples, under the direction of the Apostles, ever rested from all their labors on any one first day, or ever worked on the seventh day? Where in the New Testament is the first day called the Sabbath? What right have ministers now to call it so? Do not this last-mentioned class of Baptists also mutilate the law of God, and "make void his command, that they may keep their tradition?" Oh, when will Baptists abandon the "errors" of the Romanists and Lutherans, and all other "errors" on this subject, and take "the Bible as the only rule of faith and practice?" And when will all Protestants make "the Bible alone their religion?"

CONSCIENCE AND LEGISLATION.

In a recent letter of the Honorable Secretary of State of the United States, occurs the following passage:—

"No man is at liberty to set up, or affect to set up, his own conscience as above the law, in a matter which respects the rights of others, and the obligations, civil, social, and political, due to others from him. Such a pretense saps the foundations of all government, and is, of itself, a perfect absurdity."

From a somewhat lengthy review of the above remark, by one of our esteemed correspondents, we copy the following suggestive paragraphs:—

"Let us now investigate the relative bearings of conscience and legislation—of the the "higher law," and human constitutions and human legislation.

1st. No point in Moral Philosophy is more clear, more consonant with reason, than that the religious element in our spiritual constitution renders a moral government for us possible—is a sine qua non to government. Take it away, and the very idea of legislation perishes with it; and the development of the notion becomes impossible. No matter how intelligent, in other respects—how capable of induction or deduction—the notion of oughtness and accountability could never be attained nor appreciated by such a mind, through any possible formula of analysis or synthesis, investigation or demonstration. Legislation for such, by another, would be a nullity—by itself, impossible.

2d. The conscience is the measure of this element—rather, the element itself, in its activities. Without it, government is impossible. Thus, in the earliest stages of our existence, so soon as we become human beings, the quiescent element is undoubtedly a constituent portion of our humanity, and its development possible, certain conditions being supplied; but there is, nevertheless, no conscience, and, consequently, no moral government possible, until the conditions of its manifestations are supplied; some of which are, acquisition of language, a certain amount of light to the understanding, development of the reason to a certain extent, and a standard of moral judgment. The physical idiosyncracies, which facilitate the development, or retard it, or even lock up, as in a leaden shroud, the element itself, are dropped from the account.

3d. The conscience will be as these conditions, and especially, other things being equal, it will be as its standard or ultimate law. No matter what that law may be, whether drawn from the teachings of Confucius, the sacred books of Lamaism, Budhism, Hindooism, Mahomedism, from the most scanty gleanings of the traditionary lore of the Jewish and Christian revelation, it necessarily forms the ultima thule for the individual.

4th. The next step is a very easy, very natural, very necessary inference from these premises, viz: The standard to which the conscience appeals, and which it acknowledges as authoritative, whether that standard be the right one or a wrong one, becomes the foundation for government, the conscience giving its assent to the legislation and administration which may be in harmony with this standard of right and wrong, or condemning it, if this harmony is wanting. Thus, so long as government rests upon this foundation, and modifies itself so as to meet the the fluctuations of the common religious light of the masses, so long it rests upon a rock, and cannot be moved. But let the governor or legislator depart from this without first preparing the public mind, and, unless he have a sufficiently powerful mercenary force on which to rely, and with which to execute his decrees, his foundation is gone, his legislation becomes a dead letter, and his administration a laughing stock, a thing powerless and contemptible.

5th. In view of this, I submit the question for decision, whether he who sets up conscience and the higher law as above mere human legislation, and giving to the latter all its binding force, or taking from it all sanctity, or he who legislates in utter disregard of these, and sets them at defiance, is the one against whom rests the charge of sapping "the foundation of all government," and whether this setting up of conscience "is, of itself, a perfect absurdity."

TRAGEDY AND DEATH.

A terrible tragedy occurred on the line of the New York and Erie Railroad, near Baker's Bridge, Allegany Co., N. Y., on Sunday evening, the 24th ult. It is stated that there had been a strike among the workmen not long previous to the affair, and that they at length submitted to the chagrin of returning to work without an increase of wages. For this, or some other cause, they had imbibed a serious dislike to one of the contractors. On the evening mentioned, a show of disorder was made among the workmen, at a shanty where liquor is kept, and the contractor mentioned was requested, by a person from the scene of disturbance, to go and use his influence to have it stopped. He went, followed or accompanied by a man employed as clerk. As he entered, the door was forcibly closed and fastened behind him, and the lights extinguished. The scene that followed was terrible. There was hustling, pitching, firing of revolvers, groaning, and gushing of blood. The door was broken in by the clerk, and he became an actor in the defense. When lights were brought to disclose the result, two men were found dead or dying, another with one or two shots through the hand. The contractor was found in a state of partial unconsciousness, with marks of violent treatment upon his person, which render his recovery at least doubtful. A coroner's inquest was held, and a verdict was rendered of justifiable homicide on the part of those who acted in the defense. It is thought to have been a plot laid to take the contractor's life.

It is also stated, that the body of an Irishman was found in a mill-pond, near Almond, some two or three miles from the scene of the above tragedy, on the morning of Monday, the 2d inst., with marks of violence upon it.

The Railroad, for some distance, in that vicinity, involved considerable labor, and consequently accumulated many hands, who were principally Irish, and the result has been to make the spot a scene of almost constant disturbance, subjecting the county to an onerous burden of expense. T. E. B.

A LEGACY BECOMING AVAILABLE.—A gentleman named Fox, who died some years since in the city of Augusta, left the most of his large estate to sundry benevolent societies—among others to the Georgia Missionary Society. The heirs contested the will; but a letter in the Watchman and Observer says that the legacy will soon be paid, amounting to above $12,000, of which the principal will be invested, and the interest expended.

GREAT STATE CONVENTION UPON THE FUGITIVE SLAVE BILL AT SYRACUSE.—There will be a State Convention at the city of Syracuse, on the 7th, 8th and 9th of January next, to consider the Fugitive Slave Bill, recently enacted by Congress. Let there be previous meetings in all the Assembly districts in the State, and let at least as many delegates be sent to the proposed Convention, as there are members sent to the Assembly. Similar Conventions are to be held in other States, and we trust that before the close of January there will be a Convention of the Free States to withstand this whelming tide of oppression.

A MAN RESCUED FROM SLAVERY.—In October, 1842, Eli Terry was kidnapped near Indianapolis and sold into Slavery. In the summer of 1849 information was received by his friends that he had been heard of in Red River County, Texas. The African Committee of Indiana Yearly Meeting (Quaker) being informed of the facts, employed an efficient lawyer and two competent witnesses to go the distance of some 2,500 miles to endeavor to effect his release. Being furnished with the necessary proofs, authenticated by the Seal of the State of Indiana, they started on their mission Dec. 11, 1849, and having accomplished their object by means of a habeas corpus, they returned early in February, and restored the man to his father's house. The expense of the restoration was $677 20.

CAPTURE OF A SLAVER.—The Liberia Herald of September 17, contains the following account of the capture of a slaver, the "Chatsworth," formerly of Baltimore, and which has arrived at Norfolk, in charge of Passed Midshipman Sheppard, a prize to the U. S. brig Perry:—

"The U. S. brig Perry, Lieut. Comdg. Foote, is still in the Bights. A few weeks ago, off Loango, she captured a large American brig, fitted to carry 1,000 slaves. The Perry was lying at anchor, pretty close in shore, without any national insignia flying, and the master of the slaver, supposing her to be an English cruiser, ran boldly down with the American flag floating gracefully on the breeze. He did not find out his fatal error until a boat from the Perry was alongside his ship, and the boarding officer, looking up, discovered to the astonished scoundrel the absence of the English crown on his cap, and that the officer was verily an American. With all haste the fellow doused the United States flag and ran up the Brazilian—turning to the officer, and audaciously inquiring, "Do you know, sir, that this is Brazilian property." But the fellow reckoned without his host. He was unable to produce any papers whatever to sustain her Brazilian character, so a prize master was put on board, and she sailed for the United States."

HARPER'S NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE commences its second volume with the December number. Fifty-five thousand copies are issued as the first edition, and the prospect is good that editions of one hundred thousand copies will be required before the close of the second volume, one year from the time of starting. This number cantains Goldsmith's "Deserted Village," elegantly illustrated, and in future each number is to contain some master-piece of classical English literature, illustrated in the highest style of the art. The Monthly Record of Events is admirably arranged, and presents a bird's eye view of the leading facts in the history of the world as it moves. Harper & Brothers, Cliff street, New York; Terms, $3 per annum.

BRITISH PERIODICAL LITERATURE.—Leonard, Scott & Co., No. 79 Fulton street, New York, continue to issue, in an attractive style, and with commendable promptness, the London Quarterly Review (Conservative,) the Edinburgh Review (Whig,) the North British Review (Free-Church,) and Blackwood's Edinburgh Magazine (Tory.) These periodicals are the critical censors of the British scholastic and literary world. By their criticisms, they aid readers in the selection of standard valuable books; and by the epitomes which they present often obviate the necessity of consulting works too voluminous for general examination. They fill a place which American magazines cannot supply; for they discuss topics relating more strictly to the affairs, political, religious, scientific, and literary, of the continent of Europe. They are conducted by the best talent of Great Britain; and are engaged with the most important questions which interest or agitate the civilized world. Whoever subscribes to them, may read the ablest representatives of the principal parties into which the people of Great Britain are divided.

General Intelligence.

Proceedings in Congress Last Week.

We have already announced the organization of Congress on Second-day, Dec. 2d, and the presentation of the President's Message, an abstract of which we published. What followed may be stated in few words.

THIRD-DAY, Dec. 3d.

In the Senate, it was ordered that the President pro tem. appoint the Committees. Mr. Benton gave notice of several bills, granting land to Missouri for sundry purposes of internal improvements; to cede public lands to States in which they lie; to abolish salt tax. Mr. Hale offered a resolution calling for proceedings of court martial on soldiers tried at Portsmouth. Senators were voted newspapers equal to four daily papers.

In the House, Mr. Danner took his seat as representative from Pa. in place of Dr. Nes, deceased. Rev. R. R. Gurley was elected chaplain. Members were voted newspapers equal to three daily papers.

FOURTH-DAY, Dec. 4th.

In the Senate, the Committees of last session, with slight alterations, were re-appointed. Rev. C. M. Butler (Episcopalian) was elected chaplain. Ten thousand extra copies of the Message were ordered printed. The Senate then adjourned, out of respect to the memory of Hon. Chester Butler, of Pa., who died during the recess of Congress.

In the House, the death of Mr. Butler, at Philadelphia, on the 5th of October, was announced, a eulogy on his character was delivered, the usual resolutions adopted, and the House adjourned as a mark of respect.

FIFTH-DAY, Dec. 5th.

In the Senate, the President's Message and accompanying documents were ordered printed in two volumes. The Message was then referred to the appropriate commitees; after which the Senate adjourned over to Second-day.

In the House, the Speaker was authorized to appoint the standing Committees. A resolution was adopted, that a Select Committee be appointed to take into consideration the Bounty Act, passed last September, giving lands to those not heretofore provided for, and report by bill or otherwise what further legislation is necessary to secure the prompt execution of the act, within reasonable length of time; whether the existing regulations of the Commissioner of Pensions are conformable to the law; what time it will occupy to execute the same; and whether additional clerical force is necessary. It was stated that about 20,000 applications are now on file, and not over 1,200 or 1,300 have been registered. Notice was given of a joint resolution that nothing in the Bounty Land Act shall be construed to prevent the sale or transfer of the certificate or Land Warrant prior to the issue of the patent. The House then adjourned to Second-day.

European News.

The U. S. Mail Steamer Arctic arrived at New York on Fifth-day last, with four days later news from Europe.

The most important intelligence brought by this steamer is that Prussia has finally acceded to the demands of Austria. The Frankfort Diet, says the Tribune, is to be allowed to act as de facto the organ of the old Confederation, in return for which Austria consents not to compel Prussia to recognize that confederation as existing de jure, the whole question being thus resolved into a difference of words. This conclusion of the comedy has created great discontent in the army as well as among the people. Gen. Von Gröben, commanding the forces in the Electorate, resigned, and it is reported that other prominent Generals have followed his example.

The principal news from France is that the condition of Germany has caused the government to increase the army by calling out 40,000 conscripts who would else have staid at home. M. Lechevalier writes from London: "As for Changarnier and Napoleon, a reconciliation has been brought about, but it is a mere tinkering of the quarrel. The important fact in the whole is, that the President's Ministers threatened to resign in a body in case Gen. Changarnier should be dismissed. We may regard Napoleon as being henceforth shut up in a prison with his own Ministers for jailors."

In England, the furore created by the recent rescript of the Pope, has not subsided. Meetings are still being held in almost every parish in London, and in many of the provincial towns.

Accounts from Bulgaria state that the Christian population are in the actual enjoyment of all the privileges promised them by [illegible] Porte; that the concessions guarantied [illegible] Porte are not, as usual, paper promises, but carried out to the letter. The Rayahs now enjoy precisely the same privileges as the Turks. This state of things is said to be entirely owing to the justice and humanity of Reschid Pacha.

The Overland Mail from the East arrived on Nov. 18. The hill tribes on the Kohat frontier were again manifesting a hostile disposition, and the passage through their defiles was interrupted. Disaffection and mutinies among the Nizam native regiments still continued. From Hong Kong we learn that the Insurgents were getting the better of the Imperial troops. Numerous bands of robbers were plundering. Intelligence had reached Singapore of a victory gained by the Dutch over the Chinese in the Sombas river.

A terrible explosion took place on the 8th Nov., on board the man of war Volmy, on her passage from Forbay to Brest. The following account is given of the disaster:—

"On the 8th, that is four days before the squadron reached Brest, at 5 in the morning, a loud explosion was heard, followed by cries of pain. Drums were beaten and signals of distress fired. It was supposed the powder magazine had caught fire. All lights were put out; utter darkness prevailed, and in the midst of the thick smoke all hands turned to get the fire under. Between decks were heard the groans of the wounded, some of whom lay crushed under the gun-carriages, which had been torn from their places by the shock. Twenty sailors, scarcely recognizable, were extricated from the ruins, of whom 10 died immediately, and there is little hope of preserving any of the rest."

THREE DAYS LATER.—The British steamer Asia arrived at New York on Sabbath last, with three days later news from Europe.

The anti-papal agitation still rages fiercely in England, but without exhibiting any novel features.

The last advices from Hamburg are of the 19th ult. General Willisen had made another movement of his outposts, which, however, only ended in a skirmish, in which a few were killed and wounded on either side.

The news of the settlement of the questions at issue in Germany, is fully confirmed by this arrival, though as yet the details are involved in diplomatic obscurity. It is certain, however, that Prussia has assented to the sacrifice of the People and Constitution of Hesse Cassel, and to the subjugation of Schleswig Holstein by the forces of Austria and Bavaria, acting in the name of the Frankfort Diet.

The French ship Alert, with 180 coolies, from Cumsingmoon for the west coast of South America, was the scene of mutiny and murder in lat. 32° N., lon. 139° E. The coolies, who had secretly possessed themselves of arms, rose en masse. The Captain, driven from his cabin to the top of the round house, had his throat cut and was thrown overboard immediately. One of the passengers was murdered in his cabin, the cook shared the same fate in his galley, and the mate, chased up into the maintop, seeing no chance of escape, desperately precipitated himself among the miscreants, one of whom he killed instanter and desperately wounded another. The poor fellow was immediately dispatched and consigned to the deep. The boatswain, Luis Argentine, was then directed to steer the ship back to China, and the course was altered accordingly. On nearing Canton, many of the coolies left the ship in boats which came alongside; others were arrested, as probably most of them will be.

The following account of the bloody massacre of Christians at Aleppo, to which we have already alluded, is condensed from the French and German papers:—

A frightful massacre of Christians took place here on the 16th Oct. Part of the garrison was ordered to Damascus, and after its departure the city was invaded by fanatical Turks, reinforced by 3,000 Arabs collected in the outskirts, who fell upon the Christian quarter, slaying 60 Christians, although happily no European was among them—burning and pillaging two churches, and carrying off a score of young girls. The troops were beaten down—the Governor fled to a fortress outside the City, and the Syrian Patriarch was seriously wounded. The ostensible occasion of the outbreak was an attempt at conscription. But it was really an ebullition of religious hatred. There has been bitter jealousy among the old Turks ever since the appointment of General Bem and other Polish refugees to eminent military commands. Bem had further wished to enroll the Bedouins in the army, which accounts for the mass of Arabs about the City. The disturbance extended to Damascus, although it took another form there, and was a revival of the old feud between the Maronite and Druse Emirs, of Mt. Lebanon, who are a kind of Christian, and the Turks. It was repressed, though not without great difficulty. In a small town of the neighborhood a fanatical Dervish had murdered a child of 14 years, and Joseph Tommasi, a Venetian refugee. The corps diplomatique had formally complained of these events to the Porte. The Sultan declared that it was his fixed resolve to establish perfect equality between the Moslems and Christians, and only regretted that the news of the chastisement should not have reached Europe at the same time with that of the crime. He has ordered three regiments, commanded by one of his ablest Generals, to march upon Aleppo, which, as is well known, is the last, strongest hold upon the Mediterranean of the inveterate and active hatred of Christianity.

Twelve Days Later from California.

By the steamers Georgia and Empire City, from Chagres, we have received California news to Nov. 1—twelve days later. The Georgia brought the mails, 350 passengers, and about one million dollars in gold dust. The Empire City brought 325 passengers, and near two million dollars in gold dust.

These steamers report that the Cholera has been quite fatal in Kingston, Jamaica, but is now more severe in other parts of the Island. Kingston is reported to have lost 5,000 by the scourge.

The cholera has made its appearance at San Francisco, and occasioned a large number of deaths. On the 31st of October there were about twenty deaths by cholera in San Francisco.

There was a terrible steamboat explosion at San Francisco on the 29th of October, by which from thirty to fifty lives were lost. As the steamer Sagamore was casting off from Central wharf, with a large number of passengers, bound for Stockton, her boiler burst with a terrible explosion. Masses of timber and human bodies were scattered in every direction. Many bodies were blown into the water, from which they were recovered by the numerous boats which thronged about the scene of the disaster. The boat was a complete wreck, and from among the fragments were taken the dead and the dying, mutilated in a manner shocking to behold. Many bodies were so much mutilated that it was found impossible to recognize them. Limbs and fragments were gathered up in baskets—a shocking sight.

A Chilian woman and a Sydney woman had a quarrel in Stockton street, San Francisco, when the Chilian stabbed the latter, it is supposed mortally. Two men who had provoked this quarrel, had an altercation shortly afterward, when both were shot by each other's hands.

The City Hospital of San Francisco, was destroyed by fire on the 31st of October. The fire broke out in the dwelling house of Mrs. Irene McCready, corner of Clay street and Prospect Place, which was destroyed (loss $10,000,) and then communicated to the Hospital adjoining. Here were nearly 150 sick persons, all of whom were removed in safety. They were first removed on their cots to the open air, and then bestowed in the neighboring houses. The Hospital was a large and well finished building, and erected at a heavy expense. The loss is some $40,000.

Mining in California has not been successful this year as last. True, the aggregate product is much greater; but three or four times as many have been employed in producing it. Most of the capital and much of the labor employed in gold-seeking were directed last Spring to the turning of rivers, so as to lay bare their beds to the operations of the pan and the rocker. Some of these were successful, but the far greater number were prematurely interrupted by the early rains and rapid rise of streams in autumn, or proved injudiciously located. There have, of course, been instances of brilliant success, but as a whole the dumming business in 1850 has been unlucky.

Steamer Abandoned at Sea—Nine Lives Lost.

The Helena Sloman, a new iron screw steamer, built at Hull, England, of 800 tuns burden, and 180 horse power, commanded by Capt. P. N. Paulsen, which had already made two successful trips between Hamburg and New York, left the former city on her third voyage on the 26th of October, calling at Southampton for passengers and freight. At the latter port she completed her loading, leaving there on the 1st Nov. at 2 P. M. for New York. Her cargo consisted of 100 tuns of iron, and about 150 tuns of German and French merchandize, a large proportion of the latter being extremely valuable. Beside this, she had on board 22 passengers in her first cabin, 31 in the second, 91 steerage, and a crew of 36 men, including Engineers, &c.—in all 180 souls, all, with the exception of 5 or 6 English, being Germans. From the time of her departure from Southampton till the 19th Nov., nothing occurred worthy of note, unless it be that the weather was more boisterous than usual, even for the time of year. On the night of the 19th, in the midst of a gale, a heavy cross sea struck her, carrying away her rudder, and twelve feet of the outer stern-post, bending the shaft of the propeller so as to render it useless, and causing two or three bad leaks. In this condition the steamer was driven about by the sea from the 20th to the 27th of Nov., the crew and passengers meanwhile working continually at the pumps to keep the water down. On the 27th, the packet ship Devonshire, from Liverpool for New York, came to their relief, and took off all the passengers and crew, whom she brought to this port. We regret to say, that while taking off passengers one of the boats of the Devonshire was stove, by which the third mate, who had charge of the boat, three seamen, and five passengers, were drowned.

Sir John Ross's Carrier Pigeons.

Many contradictory statements have appeared respecting the arrival of these pigeons, and more than one paragraph, reporting that "three of these, bringing important dispatches, have returned," has found its way into the public prints. We are glad to have it in our power, says the London Standard, to give an authentic account of these ærial messengers. On Sunday, the 13th of this month, a carrier pigeon was observed sitting on the top of a pigeon house at Annanhill, which, being under repair, was shut up; and on the Wednesday following, Miss Dunlop (this lady presented the pigeons to Sir John Ross) was informed by a friend that a strange carrier pigeon had taken refuge at Shewalton, the seat of the Lord Justice General. The pigeon was secured and taken to Miss Dunlop, who at once recognized it as one of the young pair, both of which Sir John Ross had intimated to her his intention to send off as soon as he was frozen in for the winter, and promised to send dispatches by them. No letter has, however, been received, and although another bird of the same kind has been seen in the neighborhood, which it is thought may be the mate of the one caught, it had not, up to the 24th, been secured. When the pigeon in question was taken into the house where it was reared, and in which were forty nests, the little creature flew at once into the nest where it had been hatched. The foregoing is a simple statement of the facts, and is of great interest in more ways than one. We should be glad to receive any remarks upon the flight of these birds, from any ornithologist of repute. The probable position of Sir John Ross would be to the westward of Barrow Strait.

Dreadful Steamboat Disaster.

The Mobile Herald brings news that the steamboat Antionette Douglass was blown up on the 26th of November. Previous to the occurrence the Douglass was lying aground on Tate's Shoal, and, while her Captain was making every effort to get her over it, she burst one of her boilers with a terrific explosion. At the time the greater part of the passengers (numbering some 125) were asleep. The noise woke them, and those who were unhurt fled to the deck in the greatest terror. The scalding steam rushed through and enveloped all parts of the boat. With great difficulty, a number of the passengers, with several of the wounded, fled in their night clothes to a barge laden with cotton, which the Douglass had in tow. This was cut loose from the wreck, and went drifting down the stream. Fortunately, the steamboat Arkansas No. 5 was lying about a mile above the scene of the disaster. She soon reached the burning ruin, and took off those of the passengers who were on it—thus, in all probability, saving numbers of them from a watery grave, or a more terrible death by fire. She then drifted down and took off those who were on the barge which was cut loose.

The Mobile Advertiser of Nov. 27, says:

"Our city is shrouded in gloom, produced by the death, burial, or shipping to friends and loved ones the disfigured bodies of the unfortunate sufferers by this destructive explosion. When our paper went to press Tuesday night, only three were known to be dead. Yesterday, eight others died. The scene, as detailed by the survivors, was beyond description awful. The groans and cries of the wounded, those who escaped are unable to describe without shuddering. Those sleeping or seated directly over the boilers were generally the sufferers, as they fell through the cabin floor upon the boilers. Lockett, Cole, and Tuttle, who are among the dead, fell together, and, in their struggles amid the red hot iron and steam, were terribly burned. The flesh was burned entirely from the inside of their hands. Mr. Nelms also fell with them, but he is likely to recover, although the flesh is all burned from his hands, and his face badly burned."

Insane Asylum Burnt—28 Patients Missing.

A telegraphic dispatch from Augusta, Me., dated Dec. 4, says:—

"The Hospital for the Insane, at Augusta, was destroyed by fire this morning, and it is thought that 20 of the unfortunate lunatics perished in the flames. It is supposed that the fire was occasioned by a defect in the chimney. Some of the lunatics gave the alarm as soon as the fire was discovered, but the keepers, supposing the noise to be the accustomed ravings, gave no heed to them until they discovered that the building was filling with smoke."

A dispatch from Augusta, Dec. 6, says:—

"The number of patients missing since the burning of the Insane Hospital is twenty-eight—all males. Henry Jones, an attendant, was the only sane person who perished. He was endeavoring to rescue those under his charge. With but few exceptions, all those lost were incurable, and it is believed that most of them died from suffocation. It is estimated that the damages done to the Hospital can be repaired for $50,000. The entire building, with seven others, were destroyed."

CURIOUS SPECIMENS OF HUMANITY.—There is on exhibition at the Horticultural Hall, Boston, a boy and a girl, said to be from an almost extinct race in Central America. The boy is 32 inches in hight, weighing 16 pounds, and in the opinion of eminent physicians must be near 10 years of age. The girl is 28 inches in hight, weighs 14 pounds, and is apparently some two or three years younger than her brother. Their heads are not larger than an infant's, and the whole contour of their physiognomy is singular in the extreme. The careful reader of Stephens' voluminous travels in Central America will immediately notice the strong resemblance existing between their faces and many of those described and drawn by him from the stone ruins of those ancient Artec cities. Their jet, Indian-like hair, grown low upon the front, leaves a mere trace of forehead, but they have finely developed noses, projecting upper lip, receding chin, and clear, lustrous, and expressive black eyes. There is not the slightest similitude in their appearance to idiocy, or least resemblance to the Simia tribe. Their utterance is confined to a few simple sounds. They are said to be of the remnant of a tribe of priests, dwindled almost to extinction by constant intermarriage with their own caste; and are reported to have been taken in war, and to have passed from the hands of their captors into the custody of an English traveler, whence they have been brought to this country.

FROM THE GREAT SALT LAKE.—The Frontier Guardian (Mormon journal) of the 13th ult., has a few additional items of intelligence from the Mormons at the Salt Lake. The crops were very fine, the wheat yielding forty bushels per acre; oats, barley and vegetables succeding well, but too short a season for corn. Wheat was worth $4 per bushel, oats $2, board $3 50 per week, common day labor $1 50 and board, mechanical labor from $3 to $5 per day and board. Provisions bore a fair price; flour $10 per cwt.; beef, as good as ever ate, 12½ cents per lb.; potatoes $1 per bushel, and other vegetables in proportion. Groceries were paying a fine freight; coffee 50 cents per lb.; sugar 40 cents; rice 35 cts.; tea $4. All the merchants were doing well.

Stock was exorbitantly high. Mules from $125 to $200. Californians swept the Valley. Paid at Fort Bridger $110 for mules and $100 for American horses. The population of the Valley is from 23,000 to 25,000.

GOLD IN CANADA.—The Portland (Me.) Argus says: We have seen excellent specimens of gold recently dug on the Tour de Pins, near the Chaudiere River, (Quebec,) which takes its rise in Lake Megantic. From what we hear, there are strong indications of large quantities of the precious metal in that region. A company has been formed, which has purchased a township ten miles square, (in the seignory of Vandrieul,) and one of them has been sent to Virginia to note the best mode of operating the mines there. A lump of gold has been found on these diggings of over $100 value. The company have also beautiful specimens, covering about two square feet, which they intend to encase and send to the World's Fair, held in London in May next.

SUMMARY.

Michael Gibson, who keeps a boarding-house in Boston, has been arrested on charge of having outraged the person of Ann Wheeler, a young and beautiful girl, who was boarding temporarily at Gibson's house. Margaret, wife of Gibson, has been arrested as an accessory. Miss Wheeler is from Lewiston, Maine, about 17 years of age, and came to Boston in search of employment as a domestic. Gibson and his wife are in jail. The offense with which they are charged is punishable with death in Massachusetts.

On Wednesday, Nov. 20, the dignitaries of Wisconsin made a pleasure excursion over about five miles of the Milwaukie and Mississippi Railroad. The few miles finished form the first Railroad in Wisconsin. The excursion train went over it at the rate of thirty miles an hour. Among the pleasing incidents of the trip, was the presence of Solomon Juneau, the oldest, and at one time the only white settler in Milwaukie, who had never before seen a Railroad.

A great fracas occurred on the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad, near Summit level, Dec. 4th, between the Irish and German laborers. Three Germans were killed and several badly wounded. The military were called out, arrested 25 of the Irish, and lodged them in jail.

The contract for building the Attica and Hornellsville Railroad has been taken by Rockafellow & Co., who have taken $300,000 of the stock. They promise to complete the road by the first of May, 1852.

At a meeting held at Syracuse on Tuesday, Dec. 3, the stock for the Railway from Buffalo to Erie, Pa., was taken up, principally by the Railway Companies between Albany and Buffalo, except the Utica and Schenectady, which took no stock. The Road is to be finished by September next. The fare on the express trains from Albany to Buffalo, after the 15th inst, is to be reduced to $9 50, and by the accommodation trains to $7 50.

The corps of Engineers sent out by the New York and Erie Railroad Company, to make a preliminary survey of a road from Little Valley, New York, to Erie, Pa., by way of Jamestown, have completed their labors, and Mr. Camp, who superintended the survey this side of the New York line, states that the route is entirely feasible.

A dispatch from Little Falls, dated Dec. 6, says that when the mail train going East was within 4 miles of that place, Mr. John Frame, Engineer, discovered some Irishmen in the act of placing stones upon the track. He immediately stopped the train, and with the aid of the local Superintendent, and some of the passengers, they were secured, and they are now in jail at Herkimer to await their trial at the next Court.

The Cape Verde Islands were visited with a hurricane in September, which caused great destruction of property. In San Antonia alone, more than 60 houses are stated to have been destroyed by the wind and rain combined. Several American vessels were either wrecked or damaged at Boa Vista and Sal. The English ship Sir Robert Peel was entirely lost, and the crew were saved by taking to their boats, when distant more than 100 miles from San Antonia.

At Buffalo, on the evening of Dec. 3d, Mr. Tyler arrested a man named James Rogers, of New York, having about him $2,000 in counterfeit notes, principally on the Bank of New York. They are well done and deceived some of the best judges. Rogers was examined and committed for trial.

The ship Washington, Capt. Page, which arrived at this port last week, from Liverpool, had on Board nine hundred and sixteen steerage passengers. This is the largest number of persons ever brought across the Atlantic in one vessel. They were all in good health.

Mr. Junius Smith is successfully cultivating the tea plant in South Carolina. He has received this year, direct from China, a large quantity of plants, which arrived in good condition, and almost all are living and doing well.

In a letter in the Buffalo Commercial Advertiser, from London, the writer says he finds American apples are wanted. There have been no shipments for two years from abroad—15,000 barrels will find immediate sale at good prices.

The Boston Journal has information that at Chardon, Ohio, fifty of the most respectable citizens have formed themselves into a military company, to resist the execution of the Fugitive Slave Law.

One evening last week a man attempted to drown himself in the Park Fountain, New York. He plunged his head under water repeatedly, until he was taken out by a couple of police officers.

A complete history of the Indian tribes who once owned the soil of Connecticut, is about to be published, under the auspices of the Historical Society of that State.

The annual number of travelers on the Mississippi river is about 500,000. The number of lives lost annually by accidents, for several years past, has been over 200.

Miscellaneous.

Report of the Postmaster General—Abridged.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT, Nov. 30, 1850.

SIR: The number of mail routes within the United States, at the close of the fiscal year ending on the 30th of June last, was 5,590; the aggregate length of such routes was 178,672 miles; and the number of contractors employed thereon, 4760.

The annual transportation of the mails on these routes was 45,546,423 miles, at an annual cost of $2,724,426, making the average cost about 5 cents and $8\frac{1}{2}$ mills per mile.

The increase in the number of inland mail routes during the year was 649; the increase in the length of mail routes was 10,969 miles, and the annual transportation of the year exceeded that of the previous year by 3,997,354 miles, at an increased cost of $342,440.

The mail service in California and Oregon, having been irregular in its performance, and imperfectly reported to the Department, has not been embraced in the foregoing statements.

There were, on the 30th of June last, five foreign mail routes, of the aggregate length of 15,079 miles, and the annual price of the transportation, payable by this Department, was $264,506; being an increase of $8,814 on the cost of the preceding year.

There should be added to the cost of transportation, as above stated, the expense of mail messengers, and local and route agents, (which expense is chargeable to the transportation fund,) and which for the last fiscal year amounted to $107,042; being an increase of $45,529 on the expenses of the mail messengers, and local and route agents, for the preceding year.

The increase of our mail service for the last fiscal year, over the year preceding, was about $9\frac{4}{10}$ per cent. and the increase in the total cost was about $12\frac{7}{10}$ per cent.

The number of Postmasters appointed during the year ending June 30, 1850, was 6,518. Of that number, 2,600 were appointed to fill vacancies occasioned by resignations; 233 to fill vacancies occasioned by the decease of the previous incumbents; 262 on a change of the sites of the offices for which they were appointed; 1,444 on the removal of their predecessors; and 1,979 were appointed on the establishment of new offices.

The whole number of Post Offices in the United States at the end of that year, was 18,417. There were 1979 Post Offices established, and 309 discontinued, during the year.

The Postmasters and other agents of the Department have, with few exceptions, performed their duties with fidelity and promptness, and maintaned the credit of the Department for efficiency and usefulness.

The failures of connection which have from time to time occurred on some of the routes, have caused much inconvenience and annoyance. It is hoped, however, that the renewed requirement of the returns of weekly and monthly registers of the arrivals and departures, by the Postmasters at the ends of each route, which are now regularly made to the Department, and the efficient action of the increased number of special agents, will render these irregularities less frequent.

The gross revenue of the Department for the year ending June 30, 1850, was $5,552,971 48, derived from the following sources:

From letter postage, including foreign postage and stamps sold	$4,575,663	86
From newspaper and pamphlet postage	919,485	94
From fines	38	00
From miscellaneous items	3,048	66
From receipts on account of dead letters	1,748	40
	$5,499,984	86
From the appropriation made by the 12th section of the act of 3d March, 1847, for the franked matter of the Departments	200,000	00
	$5,699,984	86

The expenses of the current year are estimated at $6,019,800 90; the revenue for the same time is estimated at $6,166,616 28; showing a balance in favor of the Department of $146,806 38. * * *

A considerable reduction of letter postage, and the adoption of a uniform inland rate, is desired by a large portion of the people of the United States. Interesting and able reports, recommending different degrees of reduction, were made, but not acted upon, at the last session of Congress. The subject will doubtless again engage the attention of Congress at its approaching session; and, with an earnest desire that our rates of postage may be reduced to the lowest point that is practicable without calling for a contribution from the Treasury beyond what should be paid for the transmission and delivery of the official and public correspondence, I recommend that the inland letter postage be reduced to three cents the single letter, when pre-paid, and be fixed at the uniform rate of five cents when not pre-paid; and also, that the Postmaster General be required to reduce this pre-paid rate to two cents the single letter, whenever it shall be ascertained that the revenues of the Department, after the reductions now recommended, shall have exceeded its expenditures by more than five per cent. for two consecutive fiscal years. I also recommend that the postage to California and Oregon be greatly reduced, and that the postage charged on other sea-going letters be made more simple and uniform. With the numerous rates now charged—some with, and some without, the addition of the inland rates—confusion and mistakes are frequent and unavoidable. I therefore recommend that twenty cents, the single letter, be charged on all correspondence to and from the Pacific Coast, South America, the Eastern Continent and its islands, and points beyond either; and ten cents the single letter on all other sea-going letters, without the superaddition of inland postage, in any case, excepting, however, all cases where such sea postages have been or shall be adjusted at different rates, by postal treaty already concluded, or hereafter to be made; and power should be given to the Postmaster-General, by which and with the advice and consent of the President of the United States, to reduce or enlarge the sea rates, with the view of making better postal arrangements with other Governments, or counteracting any adverse measures affecting our postal intercourse with other countries.

I also recommend that the provision which imposes an additional half cent postage upon newspapers sent more than one hundred miles and out of the State where they are mailed, be repealed, so as to leave the uniform inland postage on newspapers, sent to subscribers, from the office of publication, at one cent each.

The postage upon pamphlets, periodicals, and other printed matter, (except newspapers,) may be simplified and somewhat reduced, with advantage to the Department. Two cents for the pamphlet or periodical of the weight of two ounces or less, and one cent for every additional ounce or fraction of an ounce, is recommended as the inland rate upon all pamphlets, periodicals, and other printed matter, instead of the present rate of two and a half cents for the first ounce, and one cent for every additional ounce, or fraction of an ounce. For the sea-going charge on such matter, and on newspapers, twice the inland rate to and from the points to which it is proposed that the letter postage shall be ten cents, and four times the inland rate where the letter rate is twenty cents, is deemed a just and proper rate. This would, in some cases, increase the postage on printed matter sent to the Pacific coast, and by our other sea lines, where the postage is not already fixed by postal arrangement; but the postage to California, as above proposed, would hardly equal the price now charged by private expresses for the conveyance of the same weight, in packages of less than one hundred pounds, to San Francisco.

It will be perceived that the reduction proposed in the postage upon printed matter is not large. The reason for the greater reduction of letter postage is found in the fact that the rates of postage upon printed matter are now exceedingly low when compared with the letter rates. The average postage on letters is estimated at about three dollars and sixteen cents per pound, and on newspapers or pamphlets at about sixteen cents per pound. After the reduction proposed, the average inland postage on letters will be about $2 50 per pound when not prepaid, and $1 50 per pound when prepaid.

The reductions in postage now recommended will, if carried out, reduce the revenues of the Department for the first three or four years. At the end of that period, the revenues of the Department, under the reduced tariff of postages, will probably again equal its expenditures. To meet the deficiency which must follow this reduction, the surplus revenues already accumulated may be first applied, and after these shall have been exhausted, an appropriation from the Treasury will be required, unless Congress shall deem it expedient to abolish the existing privilege of sending and receiving free matter through the mails, or to increase the annual appropriation now made to the Department, for the conveyance of a part of such free matter, to a sum equal to the revenues that would be derived therefrom, if all free matter were charged with postage.

The continuance of the franking privilege—a privilege which may be properly considered as the privilege of the constituent rather than of the representative—may be dictated by an enlightened public policy and required by the public interests; and the same may be said of the privilege possessed by newspaper proprietors of sending and receiving exchange papers free of postage. But if these privileges are continued, it is respectfully submitted that this Department should be paid for the conveyance of the matter sent free under them, by an appropriation from the public Treasury, rather than by a tax on the private correspondence of the country. If a sum equal to the postage which would be charged on all free matter, were it chargeble with postage, should be annually appropriated and paid to this Department, it is believed that such appropriation and the accumulated surplus revenue would enable the Department to sustain itself, notwithstanding the proposed reduction, or that the appropriation required would be so inconsiderable as to interpose no serious obstacle to the adoption of the measures now recommended.

In case a reduction of postage shall be made, it is suggested that it should only take effect from and after the 30th of June next, that it may go into operation at the commencement of the next fiscal year. This is desirable for the purpose of enabling the Department to present the fiscal results of the reduction with clearness and accuracy in future reports, and also for the purpose of giving time to prepare the forms, instructions and blanks, which will be necessary in consequence of the change in the rates of postage.

Any reduction of postage is likely to increase the labor, and reduce, for a time at least, the compensation of the several Postmasters. It is therefore recommended that power be given to the Postmaster General to increase the rates of commission at the smaller offices, so as to ensure the services of competent and faithful officers.

* * * * *

The locks and keys in use upon the mails of the United States have now been in service for many years, and the experienced officer of this Department, to whose charge this branch of the service has been committed, recommends that the same be changed. I concur in this recommendation, and shall ask that a sufficient appropriation for that purpose be made by Congress at the approaching session.

The publication of the list of post offices and of a new edition of the laws and regulations, for which an appropriation was made at the last session, has not been completed. The list of offices has been prepared, and its printing directed, but the printing of the new edition of the laws and regulations has not yet been ordered. The delay has been caused by the desire to await the action of Congress upon the bills affecting this Department, which were reported at the last session, and by the pressure of business which has hitherto prevented such a revision of the regulations as it was deemed expedient to make before the new edition was ordered.

The accommodations for the post office of this city are entirely unsuited to an office of its importance, and are decidedly discreditable to the Department and the country. Some improvements, lately authorized and now in progress, will afford partial and temporary relief, but other arrangements of a permanent character should soon be made. The rooms of this Department, also, are already unreasonably crowded, and additional rooms for the officers and clerks of the Department, and of the Auditor's office, will soon be absolutely required. To afford suitable accommodations for these and for the City Post Office, it is respectfully submitted that the contemplated extension of the west wing of the General Post Office building should be authorized, and that the upper floors in such wing be assigned to the Auditor and his clerks, and that the first floor be devoted to the use of the City Post Office.

The laws regulating the action of this Department and its officers are numerous, were passed at different times, and contain many obsolete and conflicting provisions. An entire revision of these laws and the passage of a single act containing all the provisions of law relating to this Department, would aid all its officers in the discharge of their duties, and give greater ease, accuracy, and dispatch to its operations. Such a revision is respectfully suggested.

In conclusion, I desire to acknowledge my obligations to my assistants and the clerks in the Department for the cheerfulness, zeal, and assiduity with which they have labored in the discharge of their respective duties, and to renew the recommendation of my predecessors, that the Assistant Postmasters General be placed upon the same footing, in respect to their compensation, as the heads of bureaus in other Departments.

N. K. HALL, Postmaster-General.

To the PRESIDENT.

United States Pensioners.

The following is an extract from the Report of Alex. H. H. Stuart, Secretary of the Interior, presented to Congress last week:—

The whole number of persons now on the pension rolls of the United States is 19,758. But many of these are probably dead. The whole number who have drawn pensions during the first and second quarters of the present calender year is 13,079. Many, however, do not draw their pensions until the close of the year, and therefore the last statement does not show the whole number living. The number of deaths reported within the last year is 846.

The whole number of persons pensioned under the act of March 18, 1818, is 20,485.

Of these there now remain on the rolls but 1,523.

Under the act of 15th May, 1828, there were added to the list of Revolutionary pensioners, 1,152.

Of these there now remain but 162.

Under the act of 7th June, 1832, there were added to the rolls of Revolutionary pensioners, 32,788.

At this time there remain of these on the rolls, 5,247.

And of this last number there were but 2,408 who have applied for their pensions during the first half of the present calendar year.

Under the Act of July 4, 1836, pensioning certain Widows and Orphans therein described, the number who have been pensioned is 4,984.

Of these there remain on the rolls but 1,118.

Under the Act of 7th July, 1838, giving pensions to the Widows of Revolutionary Officers and Soldiers who were married prior to 1794, the number of persons who have been pensioned is 11,002.

During the first two quarters of this year payment has been made under this law to 201.

The Act of 1838 was limited originally to five years, but was extended for one year by Act of 3d March, 1843; on the 17th June, 1844, it was extended for four years longer; and finally, on the 2d February, 1848, the benefits of the law were continued during widowhood. There are now on the rolls under the last mentioned act 4,876

On the 29th April, 1848, pensions were given from the 4th March, 1848, during widowhood, to widows of officers, soldiers, seamen and marines, who were married prior to January, 1800. Under this law the number pensioned is 686.

It will thus be seen that the beneficiaries under the laws designed to provide for the soldiers of the Revolution and the widows of those who were dead are rapidly passing away.

But, on the other hand, the number of pensioners under the acts for the relief of invalids and the widows of those who died in the service of the United States has been considerably augmented during the past year, in consequence of the war with Mexico.

The number of invalid pensioners is now 4,742, being an increase during the year of 627.

Under the act of 21st July, 1848, and the supplementary act of 22d February, 1849, and the joint resolution of the 28th September, 1850, allowing pensions to the widows and orphans of soldiers who were killed in the Mexican war, or died from disease contracted in the service, the number pensioned is 1,456.

The whole amount expended for pensions during the past year is estimated by the Commissioner at $1,400,000.

There has been paid since 1st November, 1849, on account of revolutionary service of Virginia State troops and navy, $88,060 30; and as commutation or half pay and interest, $138,543 44.

The whole number of land warrants issued to commissioned officers of the continental army is	2,826
To non-commissioned officers and privates	9,762

Land is still due to 111 officers and to 1,993 non-commissioned officers and privates.

Whole number of warrants issued to persons entitled under various acts of Congress for services in the war of 1812 is 28,978.

The number of claims presented for services in the Mexican war is	$81,373 00
And for scrip or money, in lieu of land	3,332 00
Making an aggregate of	$84,705 00

The number of claims already presented under the General Bounty Land Law of September 28, 1850, up to the 5th of November, 1850, was 9,418, and the number is increasing rapidly—scarcely a mail arriving which does not swell the list.

The whole number of persons who, if living, would be entitled to the benefit of that law, would exceed half a million.

The Commissioner supposes, from the best data within his reach, that one half are dead, leaving no person entitled to claim under them. If this estimate be correct—and I imagine it will be found to approximate accuracy—the whole number of claimants will be about two hundred and fifty thousand.

It will thus be seen, that the act of 28th September, 1850, is by far the most important bounty land law that has ever been passed, whether we consider the number of beneficiaries under its provisions or the extent of the domain granted

The Blowing Up of a Three-Decker.

CONSTANTINOPLE, Oct. 25.

A most dreadful catastrophe, attended with great loss of life, has just occurred. The Neiri Shevket, ship of the line, of 120 guns, bearing the flag of the Grand Admiral, was totally destroyed by an explosion of its powder magazine on the 23d inst. This dreadful accident occurred in the Arsenal, at about ten minutes past 10 A. M., and was so terrific as to have been heard at a great distance. It is surmised by well-informed persons of the Admirality, that it is owing to accident. The most reasonable rumor is, that it is owing to negligence, as several canisters of the powder conveyed to the magazines on shore were in a bad condition, and a quantity of this combustible was spilled. It is likely the lower deck was not swept, and some dull mariner emptied the contents of his pipe on the floor, when naturally it formed a train, and running to the powder magazine, caused an instantaneous explosion which was so powerful that it divided the ship into two parts, and blew up the upper deck with the guns and rigging full 25 feet in the air. This part fell sideways into the sea, and disappeared for a few minutes. The lower deck was then observed to catch fire and burn with intense violence for seven minutes, when the ship gradually sunk. Immediately after the explosion hundreds of kaiks and embarcations repaired to the scene of disaster, and a number of mutilated remains, showing but little resemblance to human beings, were picked up. Of the 110 taken to the temporary ambulance erected on shore, 36 died immediately after; and most of the sufferers were in such a dreadful condition that no hope whatever was entertained of their recovery. One poor fellow, a lieutenant, was picked up nearly drowned, fearfully burnt, and with a spike through his shoulder. He died six minutes after having been conveyed to the ambulance. A gallant Armenian porter had both his legs cut clean off, and still courageosly dictated a letter to his mother, informing her of his sad fate. Thousands of women and children were fighting with the sentinels to obtain access into the temporary hospital. Young women were crying for their husbands, mothers for their sons, and everybody carried out seemed to be recognized by the anxious relatives.

No official list has yet appeared, but it is ascertained beyond all doubt that the most gallant officers of the Turkish navy have been lost. We have to deplore the death of six captains, who were on board the admiral's ship in conference on a point of etiquette, as also of the aid-de-camp of the Grand Admiral, of fourteen lieutenants who were invited to an examination of several pupils of the Academy, and of twenty-five scholars of the first class.

The list of casualties is supposed to be as follows: 1 commodore (Vice Admiral Mahmoud Pacha); 1 superior officer, Capt. Pacha's aid-de-camp; 6 captains, including the commander of the Neiri Shevket; 21 lieutenants; 30 sub-officers; 25 midshipmen, including the scholars of the Academy; 640 sailors and marines; 70 workmen sent for repairs; 45 hammels employed to raise the anchors; 75 sailors belonging to the other ships, and in attendance on their officers; 50 visitors; 14 passengers in kaiks, which sunk while passing near the ship at the time of explosion; 1 Italian broker. Total 979. Deducting from this total the wounded and saved, there remains upwards of nine hundred lives lost.

The Grizzly Bear of California.

The grizzly bear is the most formidable and ferocious animal in California; and yet, with all his ferocity of disposition, rarely attacks a man, unless surprised or molested. The fellow never lies in wait for his victim. If the hunter invades his retreat, or disputes his path, he will fight, but otherwise contents himself with the immunity which he finds in the wilderness of his home, and the savage grandeur of his nature. It is never safe to attack him with one rifle; for if you fail to hit him in a vital part, he is on you in the twinkling of an eye. Your only possibility of escape is up a near tree, too slender for his giant grasp; and then there is something extremely awkward in being on the top of a tree, with such a savage monster at its root. How long he will remain there you cannot tell; it may be a day, and it may be a week. Your antagonist is too shrewd to hand you up your rifle, or let you come down to get it. You are his prisoner, more safely lodged than in a dungeon, and he will set you at liberty when it suits him. He sleeps not himself at his post; day and night his great flashing eyes are fastened upon you. The lyre of Orpheus may have lulled to sleep the sentinel of Hades; but its magic tones have never charmed to slumber the sentinel of the wild California forest.

The full grown California Bear measures from eight to ten feet in length, and four or five in girth. His strength is tremendous; his embrace, death. Had the priest of Apollo fallen into his folds, he would have perished without any of those protracted agonies which the sympathetic muses have wailed round the world. Nature has thrown over him a coat of mail, soft indeed, but impervious to the storm and the arrow of the Indian. The fur, which is of a dark brown color, is nearly a span long, and, when the animal is enraged, each particular hair stands on end. His food, in the summer, is chiefly berries, but he will now and then, on some of his feast days, slaughter a bullock. In winter he lives on acorns, which abound in these forests. He is an excellent climber, and will ascend a large oak with the rapidity of a tar up the shrouds of a ship. In procuring his acorns, when on the tree, he does not manifest his usual cunning. Instead of threshing them down like the Indian, he selects a well-stocked limb, throws himself upon its extremity, and there hangs swinging and jerking till the limb gives way, and down they come, branch, acorns, and bear, together. On these acorns he becomes extremely fat, yielding ten or fifteen gallons of oil, which is said to be sufficiently pungent and nutritive as a tonic to tuft a statue's marble head. [Colton.

The Reptile Room by Night.

The following striking account of the reptile room in the Zoological Gardens at Regent's Park, we take with some abridgment from Bentley's London Miscellany:—

"About ten o'clock one evening during last spring, in company with two naturalists of eminence, we entered that apartment. A small lantern was our only light, and the faint illumination of this imparted a ghastly character to the scene before us. The clear plate glass which faces the cages was invisible, and it was difficult to believe that the monsters were in confinement and the spectators secure. Those who have only seen the boas and pythons, the rattlesnakes and cobras lazily hanging in festoons from the forks of the trees in their dens, or sluggishly coiled up, can form no conception of the appearance and actions of the same creatures at night. The huge boas and pythons were chasing each other in every direction, whisking about the dens with the rapidity of lightning, sometimes clinging in huge coils round the branches, anon entwining each other in massive folds, then separating they would rush over and under the branches, hissing and lashing their tails in hideous sport. Ever and anon, thirsty with their exertions, they would approach the pans of water and drink eagerly, lapping the water with their forked tongues. As our eyes became accustomed to the darkness, we perceived objects better; and on the uppermost branch of the tree, in the den of the biggest serpent, we perceived a pigeon quietly roosting, apparently indifferent alike to the turmoil which was going on around, and the vicinity of the monster whose meal it was soon to form. In the den of one of the smallest serpents was a little mouse, whose panting sides and fast-beating heart showed that it, at least, disliked its company.

* * * * * * *

"During the time we were looking at these creatures, all sorts of odd noises were heard. A strange scratching against the glass would be audible—it was the carnivерous lizard endeavoring to inform us that it was a fast day with him, entirely contrary to its inclination. A sharp hiss would startle us from another quarter, and we stepped back involuntarily as the lantern revealed the inflated hood and threatening action of an angry cobra. Then a rattlesnake would take umbrage, and, sounding an alarm, would make a stroke against the glass, intended for our person. The fixed gaze from the brilliant eyes of the huge pythons were more fascinating than pleasant, and the scene, taking it altogether, more exciting than pleasant or agreeable. Each of the spectators involuntarily stopped to make sure that his trousers were well strapped down; and, as if our nerves were jesting, a strange sensation would every now and then be felt, resembling the twining of a small snake about the legs. Just before leaving the house, a great dor beetle which had flown in, attracted by the light, struck with some force against our right ear. Startled we were, for at the moment our impression was that it was some member of the happy family around us who had favored us with a mark of his attention."

Never did an Irishman utter a better bull than did honest John, who, being asked by a friend—"Has your sister got a son, or is it a daughter?" Replied, "Upon my soul, I don't know whether I am an uncle or an aunt."

DeRuyter Institute.

THE Academic Year of this Seminary, for 1850 and '51, will commence the third Wednesday in August, and continue forty-four weeks, including a short recess between the terms, and one of ten days for the winter holidays.

The year is divided into three terms:—

The first, of 14 weeks, begins Wednesday, August 21st, and ends Wednesday, November 27th.

The second, of 15 weeks, begins Monday, December 2d, and ends Friday, March 14th.

The third, of 14 weeks, begins Tuesday, March 18th, and ends Tuesday, June 24th.

Board of Instruction.

Teacher of German, Piano Forte, and Assistant in Greek and Latin.

Other competent Teachers will be employed as occasion may demand.

TEACHERS' CLASSES will be formed, as usual, at the beginning of the Fall and middle of the Winter Terms, and continue seven weeks.

In the Common Branches, classes will be formed at the commencement of each term; but in the higher, the interest of the student, as well as the welfare of the Institution, demand that a more systematic course of study be pursued.

In the Natural Sciences, Elementary Chemistry and Philosophy will be pursued during the Fall Term Agricultural Chemistry, Astronomy, and Physiology during the Winter Term; Botany and Geology during the Summer Term.

Classes will be formed in Latin, French, and German, at the commencement of the Fall Term; in Hebrew, Greek, and Spanish, at the commencement of the Winter Term, and continue through the course of study.

In Mathematics, Geometry is studied in the Fall, Trigonometry and Conic Sections in the Winter, and Astronomy, Surveying, Navigation, &c., in the Summer Term.

The course of instruction in Agriculture is thorougly scientific, embracing study and recitation in the best authors. Instruction is given in a well-furnished laboratory, in the analysis of soils, ashes of plants, manures, &c. and the modes of testing for their constituent elements. The attention of farmers who wish to give their sons a practical education is especially called to this department.

Board in private families, from $1 25 to $1 50. Many students board in clubs for 60 to 75 cents.

A WORD ABOUT HUMAN AND DIVINE LAW.

The passage of the late Fugitive Act seems not to be without some good effect. It has elicited thoughts, both on politics and morals, quite worthy of attention. Notwithstanding all the apparent diversity of opinion, there seems to be a tendency to develop at least one great truth. The duty of obedience to "the powers that be," seems likely to be well considered. We most cheerfully concede this duty; and more—we urge it as the will of God. Whether this duty be an unqualified one, we have presumed to question. We must differ with those writers who urge this duty without conditions. Our opinion is, that under some circumstances it is duty to obey human laws, but that under others obedience is the height of impiety.

Among the writers who oppose this opinion, we class one who closes a well-written article in the Recorder by saying, "Let us learn to respect the [fugitive] law for its own sake." To those who have been taught to respect law for a very different reason, this exhortation needs explanation; and especially since it is founded on a remarkable misconception of the law in question. It is not very remarkable, that those writers who feel such reluctance at having hard names applied to hard laws, should apply such epithets as anarchists, fanatics, theorists, &c., to those who happen to hold opinions not well appreciated by them. It is not remarkable, for it has the sanction of universal practice. Reformers as much expect such designations, when these writers hold forth, as the Romans expected to hear "Patres Conscripti," when Cicero arose before them. It is a little remarkable, however, that a writer displaying such extensive legal erudition in the discussion of law in general, should so egregiously mistake the character and design of the very law in defense of which she had risen up.

It is asked, "And what, after all, is the design of this Act?—to betray freemen into slavery, or to interpose any barrier in the way of lawful emancipation?" The writer has given to this interrogation a double negative. Why did not our friend, who seems more acquainted with the rules of logic than with the statutes of Russian, Algerine, or American despotism, show us why the subjects of this Act are not freemen? Our opinion is, that the fugitive from slavery, whom this Act proposes to reduce to thraldom, is morally, legally, and actually, a freeman. He is morally free, because the God of Nature has endowed him with the right to liberty, and has made this right inalienable. It matters not, therefore, though he has spent three score years and ten in slavery; if he still live, he lives as God created him, naturally and morally free. He is actually free, because he enjoys the unrestricted exercise of those natural rights which make him morally free. He is legally free, because the laws which made him an actual and legal slave cease their effect upon him as soon as he removes to a Free State; and, having met the conditions of citizenship in said State, he enters upon all the privileges and immunities granted to her citizens, and is protected by all the authority of the municipal laws which he helps to enact, and for the administration of which he pays his proportionate tax. When this Act finds him, then, he is in every sense a freeman. Its avowed purpose is to make him a slave. But we go farther, and affirm, that the fugitive was not a legal slave whilst he remained in the State whence he has fled, for the reason, that slave laws are unconstitutional and void, every one of them. They are unconstitutional—1st. Because they subvert the very design for which the Constitution was adopted by the people, viz. "To establish justice, and secure the blessings of liberty." 2d. Because they not only conflict with the spirit but with the letter of the Constitution, which makes it obligatory upon Congress to make sure to every State a republican form of government; and a republican form of government, says Jefferson, is one under which no individual can be deprived of a single natural right. 3d. Because the Constitution affirms that "no person shall be deprived of liberty without due process of law." Now not a slave in the U. S. (except such as are confined for crime in our jails and penitentiaries) has been deprived of liberty by "due process of law." This "process of law," says an eminent lawyer and jurist of the Empire State, "implies, 1st. an accusation of crime; 2d, Arrest and examination by legal process; 3d, Trial before a Jury of his pears; 4th, Verdict by the Jury; 5th, Sentence by the Judge." Since, then, no such process has ever been instituted against the millions of our countrymen in bondage, since they are not even "accused of crime," not one of them is legally deprived of liberty. 'Tis unmitigated fraud, and downright robbery, from beginning to end. This Act, then, proposes to make slaves of men who not only are not, but never have been, morally or legally slaves.

But if we yield this point, and only insist that the Act is designed to keep in slavery such as are already legally such, it loses none of its barbarity; for we ask, Is it not as iniquitous to keep robbing God's image of its glory, as to commence doing so? Is it not as wicked to continue abusing a man as to commence abusing him? If there be any truth in reason or revelation, an act to continue slavery is equivalent in crime to an act ordaining it.

Believing as we do, that the Constitution, in design, in spirit, and in letter, stands up the great antagonist of slavery, and bulwark of freedom, there is great consistency in praising it; it is our best friend. But if it be what the writer under review claims it to be—the destroyer of liberty, the friend of slavery—how ought every patriot and Christian to loathe it! The writer has assumed section 2d of article 4th as a proof text. She assumes, without an effort at proof, that the person there spoken of is the fugitive slave, and remarks, that not a syllable of the Constitution, except that clause, is applicable to the condition of the slave. We agree to that, and remark, that not a syllable of the clause under consideration is applicable to the condition of the slave, by any established rule of interpretation. The following are the fundamental rules of interpretation laid down by the Supreme Court of the United States, and other judicial tribunals, which must be adhered to:—

1st. All language must be construed in favor of right, unless expressed with irresistible clearness in favor of wrong.

2d. Language susceptible of either construction, must always be construed in favor of right.

3d. No terms in any legal document, except those which are express, explicit, distinct, unequivocal, and to which no other meaning can be given, are legally competent to sanction any thing contrary to natural right.

4th. The preamble to a legal document must be the guide in interpreting its provisions, and any provision not consistent with the preamble is null and void.

Now, since the term slave does not occur in section 2d of article 4th, it is by inference, predicated on the condition described, that it is made applicable to the slave. We are, then, to examine the condition described, to see if the language is so "express, explicit, distinct, and unequivocal, that no other meaning can be given to it." The only condition mentioned in the clause is that of labor due under the laws of the State from which the person has escaped. Now, if there be any labor due from man to man which consists with "natural right," we must construe this clause to mean that, or defy all established rules of legal interpretation, and make the Constitution belie its professions. There is a kind of service which consists with natural right. We must, then, apply this clause to that service, which makes the document consistent with itself. If it apply to this service, it cannot apply to slavery. This service is the service of apprentices, and other persons "held to service for a term of years," as specified in another part of the instrument. To this class it can apply consistently with the preamble and justice; but to the slave it cannot. Moreover, the legal condition described is not the legal condition of the slave; for no law of any Slave State holds the slave to labor, any more than it holds a horse or a cart to labor; and, moreover, more than half of the slave population are too young or too old to labor, and to such, certainly, a legal condition of labor could not be attached. But again, the condition is that of labor legally due. Now the veriest novice in jurisprudence knows that this cannot be the condition of the slave, who can neither own nor owe anything—a fact which the laws of the Slave States expressly affirm.

This construction is confirmed by facts as well as reason. The term service means the labor of a servant. The term servant, in all legal documents of the colonies, was employed to [illegible] class, and the term slave to mean [illegible]. These terms were thus employed [illegible] colonial charters and in the [illegible] Confederation, and the same [illegible] in the use of the term servant [illegible] Constitution. When the clause was moved in the Convention by Mr. Butler, it included both servants and slaves; but the delivering up of slaves being objected to, Mr. Sherman moved to amend by striking out the term slave, leaving the clause to demand [illegible] the delivery of servants. The [illegible] amended, was adopted, and [illegible] applying to those whose legal condition is that of labor due, and to none others. Such is not and can not be the legal condition of the slave. This clause, therefore, does not and can not apply to the slave. The Act in question, failing to find shelter under this clause, seeks elsewhere in vain, and stands directly opposed to some of the plainest provisions of the Constitution.

But what matters it whether the act be constitutional or not, so far as duty to obey is concerned? Verily, nothing; for the authority of the law is equal to the authority of the Constitution. Nothing is gained, then, if it be constitutional. If any act be opposed to the plain teachings of the Bible, all the Constitutions in the universe could impose no obligation to obey it. Does God require us to obey the powers that be without condition? Let us see. Suppose the powers that be command us to steal, but God commands us not to steal. Now, if God commands us to obey this mandate of the powers that be, then certainly be at the same time commands us to steal and not to steal. It is an axiom in ethics, that there can not at the same time be an obligation to do and not to do a certain deed. It may be asserted, as a universal principle, that God can never require us to obey a human enactment which conflicts with divine law. Human government is an ordinance of God for a certain purpose, and when so administered as to meet that purpose, its mandates are obligatory, and only then; for God's purpose is unchangeable. The object intended to be secured is the application of the principles of the second table of the Decalogue to the regulation of human conduct. When government is so administered as to subvert those principles, God no longer owns it, or requires obedience to it; but, as sure as God is true, "I will even appoint over you terror, consumption, and the burning ague, that shall consume the eyes, and cause sorrow of heart, and ye shall sow your seed in vain, for your enemies shall eat it." Lev. 26:16. Now we affirm, on the authority of universal history, that this terrible denunciation has been visited on those nations which have persisted in defiance to God's law. Let the exhumed and unexhumed ruins of Tyre, Sydom, Gaza, Sodom, Gomorrah, Ninevah, Edom, and cities numberless, speak a warning voice. "Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself," is the principle declared by Christ to be embodied in the second table of the Decalogue. We hazard nothing in affirming, that the ultimate object of human government is to secure the application of this principle. The love enjoined is active benevolence—not passive emotion—and stands opposed to all evil doing by man to man. Whenever any government commands evil doing to man, it departs from its legitimate object, and arrays itself against God; and, as the duty to do good to all men is unchangeably binding, of course to do evil cannot be obligatory. The Fugitive Act cannot be binding for this very reason, that it not only forbids to do good to our neighbor, but commands positive evil doing. It may be true, as the writer affirms, that God commanded the children of Israel to buy bondmen; it is equally true, that the same God commanded that same people not to return fugitive slaves to their masters. Paul commanded servants to obey their masters upon certain conditions; but does the writer suppose that free men of the North are slaves to the slave-catchers, that they should obey when they command "good citizens" to aid in man-catching? Some may be, but others are not. The writer in question seems to insinuate that Paul and Silas, Daniel and the worthies, did not set themselves in opposition to magistrates and laws. They did defy and openly disobey the highest powers on earth, because those authorities contravened the known will of God. Did they do right? Let those stupendous miracles which attended their disobedience, stand up in commendation of their deeds. Did the holy martyrs, who defied the power of papal Rome, do right? Let the sustaining grace of God amidst the flames of Smithfield answer. These examples teach both the duty of disobedience to wicked human laws, and also the duty of peaceable submission to their heaviest penalties. We fully believe both these to be duties, and shall endeavor to discharge such duties faithfully. We are to respect law, not for its own sake, but only because it is respectable; and if it be not respectable, of course it cannot be respected.

We hope our friend will not too severely chide us for supposing man to bear the image of God. God feels, thinks, and wills; man does the same. Sensitivity, intelligence, and free will, then, are common faculties of God and man. In this respect man is the image of God. Growing out of these primary faculties of mind, arises the moral sense, which, superadded, makes man indeed godlike in kind, though not in degree of mental endowment. Thus the fugitive and the pursuer alike bear the image of God, and no human being ever has been found, or ever will be found, who bears not the image of God. Disdainful tyrants may disown fraternity with the poor negro, but the blessed God has assured us, that He is so nearly allied to him, that whatever is done to these poorest of the poor is done to Him. Thus the slave-catcher not only actually pursues God's image, but virtually pursue God himself, when he follows the bleeding track of God's poor.

It may be true, as the writer affirms, that the white people in the vicinity of Shiloh "are too well acquainted with the character and habits of the negroes, to feel much of the spirit of abolitionism." It is this very thing which has awakened that spirit in thousands of bosoms. The negroes of our country, as a class, are poor, degraded, and ignorant, and of course immoral. But was ever a degraded and oppressed people otherwise? Ignorance is the sine qua non of slavery, and so is moral depravity. But, in the name of mercy, we ask, Is this a reason why they should not be let up? If the right to liberty depends on moral character, then what will become of the vicious of other races? But the more vicious and degraded the "character and habits of negroes" of our land, so much the more imperious the duty to be an abolitionist, and, by breaking every yoke, and letting the oppressed go free, to remove the cause of their degradation, and tear down that impenetrable barrier to their enlightenment and elevation. But we claim, and summons the history of man for witness, that the negro race, under like circumstances, stands on an equality with the Caucasian race, in intellectual and moral endowment. The intellectual world this day bows in reverence at the shrine of greatness reared by Euclid, a negro. Classics have borrowed their richest gems from Esop, a negro; and the church of God owes much of its success to the faithful labors of some of the Christian fathers who were negroes. Our reason confirms the voice of history, that the color of the negro is only cutaneous, and does not at all affect his character or his rights.

A PLEA FOR OUR PHYSICAL LIFE.

BY CHARLES MACKAY.

We do our nature wrong,
Neglecting over long
The bodily joys that help to make us wise;
The ramble up the slope
Of the high mountain cope—
The long day's walk, the vigorous exercise,
The fresh luxurious bath,
Far from the trodden path,
Or 'mid the ocean waves, dashing with harmless roar,
Lifting us off our feet upon the sandy shore.

Kind Heaven! there is no end
Of pleasures as we wend
Our pilgrimage in life's undevious way,
If we but know the laws
Of the Eternal Cause,
And for His glory and our good obey,
But intellectual pride
Sets half these joys aside,
And our perennial care absorbs the soul so much,
That life burns cold and dim beneath its deadening touch.

Welcome, ye plump green meads,
Ye streams and sighing reeds!
Welcome ye corn-fields, waving like a sea!
Welcome, the leafy bowers,
And children gathering flowers!
And farewell, for a while, sage drudgery!
What! though we're growing old,
Our blood is not yet cold!
Come with me to the fields, thou man of many ills,
And give thy limbs a chance among the daffodils!

Come with me to the woods,
And let their solitudes
Re-echo to our voices as we go.
Upon thy weary brain
Let childhood come again,
Spite of thy wealth, thy learning, or thy woe!
Stretch forth thy limbs and leap—
Thy life has been asleep;
And, though the wrinkles deep may furrow thy pale brow,
Show me, if thou art wise, how like a child art thou!

INTEMPERANCE AND THE HOLIDAYS.

From the office of the National Temperance Society, we have received a four-page Tract for the Holidays, accompanied with a Circular requesting us to "write an article early in December, on the subject of Temperance, and specially on the evils of offering intoxicating drinks during the holidays." No better way of answering the request, and promoting the temperance cause, occurs to us, than to copy the Tract, and so add a few thousand to the number of its readers.

Tract for the Holidays.

Written at the request of the National Temperance Society.

BY CHARLES HOOVER.

Editor of the New York Organ.

The Holiday Season, in our free, prosperous and happy country, beams with cheering, gladdening associations. It is a season of social and family gatherings. Friends and neighbors meet with smiles and exchange kindly greetings. Half-forgotten acquaintanceships are revived; suspended intimacies are often renewed; petty alienations and misunderstandings yield to the glow of genial sentiments. The family basks in the brightness of rekindled love. Its members, scattered abroad by the vicissitudes of life, meet again at the Christmas or New Year festival. The child comes from college, or his place in the city, to receive a parent's counsel and blessing. Brothers are met by affectionate, welcoming sisters, and bring some token of loving remembrance. The family board is loadep with good things; the fire on the home hearth sparkles and glows, as if in recognition of the general gladness; the young children delight themselves in examining their holiday gifts; and all within doors and without wears a pleased aspect.

It is often the case, however, that sorrow lurks in the train of high enjoyment, and as the tempter aimed his first blow at man's happiness in the beautiful garden of Eden, so now he watches us in the midst of our dearest delights, that he may thrust a dart unseen, and poison our cup unsuspected. Our Holidays have in time past been rendered a snare to many a generous and promising youth. Thousands of our fellow-men may date the commencement of a downward course in life to the Holiday indulgence in the draught proffered by the hand of affection or beauty. And every year, as this genial season returns, the tempter lurking in the rosy wine renews his assaults. To a considerable extent, indeed, the temperance reform has checked and modified the old drinking customs, but still there are multitudes who have yet to learn the danger of offering or accepting intoxicating drinks, particularly on the occasion of New Year calls. Our object is briefly but earnestly to appeal to all such to take the ground of safety in reference to the custom in question.

We would in the first place entreat the ladies to refrain from providing and offering any intoxicating drinks, on holiday occasions, particularly New Year. This whole thing, in fact, is in the hands of the ladies, on New Year. They are the parties called upon. They can choose beforehand what refreshments they will offer, and can provide coffee, or some other harmless beverage, without giving offense to any whose good opinion is worth possessing.

We urge the ladies not to provide wines, because otherwise you may induce some visitor, who is striving to break off from drinking, to return to his evil habit. He may have seen and felt his danger, and signed the pledge. Father and mother, brothers and sisters, and friends, are rejoicing over the change. Should he be persuaded to take wine at your hand, he is lost. The appetite returns uncontrollably and sweeps him away. Such sad results are witnessed every year. And will you run the risk of doing such a wrong? Will you send wo to that pledged but weak man's home? Will you break a fond mother's heart, by sending her son from your dwelling with the raging fire of alcohol in his veins? O spare him—spare his friends—spare both his and your own soul!

We ask you to banish from your tables all intoxicating drinks on New Year and other holiday occasions, because you may make moderate drinkers become drunkards. The single glass of wine you offer will not make your visitor drunk, but other ladies are engaged like you in offering temptation. As call after call is made, and glass after glass is taken, intoxication follows, and every lady who contributed a drop is answerable for the result. Will you be guilty of such an act? Your friend calls to pay his respects, and will you help to disgrace him? He calls to wish you a happy New Year. Will you render him miserable, and make his family wretched, and injure his character and prospects, perhaps for life, by helping to make him drunk?

We urge Ladies to the course we recommend from regard to themselves. The sentiments of a large portion of the community are entirely changed on the subject of offering intoxicating drink on any occasion. Many of those who will call on you this New Year will see the wine on your table with pain and sorrow. It will lessen their respect for, and interest in, you. They will be grieved to think of the evil of your example, and of the injury it may do. Depend upon it, Ladies, no one will esteem and respect you the less for excluding wine, &c., but the presence of these liquors will cause some to feel sad whose good opinion you value. Females have suffered such indescribable sorrows from intemperance, that every body expects the whole sex to frown upon the drinking habit at all times and in all places. Be entreated, then, ladies, to signalize the Holidays and the New Year, by taking your stand immovably against offering to your friends anything that can intoxicate.

The reasons above mentioned apply with still greater force against the drinking of intoxicating liquors, and we beg every reader to consider them, and reflect further, that instead of making the holidays a season of intemperate indulgence, we should aim to make them an occasion of sober, rational joy. And reflecting that intemperance has in past time been such a ruthless destroyer of peace, prosperity, character and happiness, let every man resolve that never shall that monster vice be encouraged by him. Look at the dear family that surrounds you in this glad season. Ah, how soon the drinking habit would change the scene.

Do you drink? Beware! Though it be ever so little you indulge in now, none can tell how soon you may lose your balance, and then Heaven pity your family, your children, your wife—your own soul.

Bring forth the pledge, then. You are happy now. Resolve to remain happy, and to that end, sign the pledge—here in the midst of the holidays sign, and your whole life shall be a holiday.

It frequently happens that friends unite in making their holiday visits and New Year calls—and sometimes pledged men may be associated with friends who have not reflected upon the evils of intoxicating drinks. In such cases, how important that those who have abjured the wine cup should earnestly inculcate their principles upon their associates, and persuade them to take the true and only safe ground. The example of an abstainer in such circumstances, joined to faithful, friendly remonstrance, may have a determining influence upon his companion, not only for the time, but for life, and thus save him many sorrows and great sins. Let no Total Abstinence man hide his light on such occasions, but faithfully and kindly press the truth upon the conscience. Do not yield this once, because it is the holiday season, but rather avail yourself of the time as specially suitable to your purpose. Who can estimate the good which might be done during the holidays, if all who profess to believe in temperance principles would be firm and zealous in their advocacy?

OBEDIENCE TO THE FUGITIVE SLAVE LAW.

The editors of the Independent having been charged with encouraging rebellion and murder by the course they have pursued in relation to the Fugitive Slave Law, make the following supposition and statements as explanatory and in justification of their course:—

We have a respectable and industrious neighbor, a member perhaps of our own church, with a wife and young family dependent upon him, and a little property accumulated about him. His history is this: He was stolen from Africa and brought to this country, or his father was before him, by a piratical slave-trader, who would be condemned to death to-morrow, in Virginia itself, if convicted of the act. For the pecuniary profit of this pirate, and without any consent on his own part, he was transferred from the slave-ship to a cotton-planter in Georgia. He labored for that planter—being in constant peril of the lash if he refused—for many years, with no return, save of that which was necessary to keep him serviceable.

He was simply a captive against his will, and under the constraint of keepers and of the whip, despoiled of the freedom which God had given him, and with his life and strength continually used, without the shadow of natural right, for the purposes of his self-appointed master. From this captivity the Man has escaped. He has come to the North; to its free schools, its free presses, its opportunities for the accumulation of property by enterprise; to all which makes it a desirable home for him. He has married. He is rearing a family. He has felt the power of religion, and is a church-member. After the dreary and bitter waste of his youthful vigor and manly strength, under the oppression of Slavery, he has reached at last a place of rest, and of personal freedom; where the powers which God gave him are at liberty to develop, where the rights of which he has been deprived are his again.

And now the Law says to that man—'You shall go back to this bondage from which you have escaped! Though it be biting and intolerable, you shall suffer it again! Though we should hang the man to-morrow, if we caught him in the act, who reduced you to it, we shall force you into it a second time! Though the Declaration of Independence, our fundamental pillar of State, declares all men to be created equal and free, and with inalienable rights, and though you have never forfeited these rights by any crime, we shall take you as you stand, and rivet upon you the chains of bondage! Although your soul recoils from it, and you fly to the altar of God for shelter, we will take you thence and plunge you a second time into Slavery, unto Death!'—Now what shall we say to this? We might say that the Legislature which takes this ground is inhuman and unchristian, and proved so by the act;—but we don't. We might say that if it has covenanted to do an act so criminal, an act which involves the very substance of barbarism, it had better break that covenant, a thousand times, and give up all that rests upon it, than sin so shamelessly and so awfully before God;—but we don't say this. We tell the Man to escape his pursuer if he can; to take care to enter into no combination with others for organized resistance; but that if he is hunted down and compelled to choose, and it seems to him better to die than to be enslaved, it is his right to resist. And we know that when we say this, we say what every freeman says in his heart that he would do himself in the like emergency. IT IS IMPOSSIBLE TO JUSTIFY THE AMERICAN REVOLUTION, IF THIS GROUND IS NOT VALID. We say, for ourselves, that we shall not forcibly resist the Law; we shall obey it, if we must, by taking its penalty. But sooner than do what it bids us, for the capture of that poor, industrious, peaceable neighbor—sooner than go a step toward his dwelling, to help reduce him to a slavery, the very thought of which makes his soul tremble—every year in the jail shall be multiplied by a thousand, and every ring in the chain shall be made of hot iron, and we will bear them freely. We would not have the awful guilt, and the Divine curse, of such an act on our soul, for a hundred Constitutions.

If this is 'murder and rebellion,' we say, as Colonel Barre said, when somebody cried Treason, against him:—"Make the most of it." It is a 'murder and rebellion' which are strangely and increasingly popular among religious men at the North, and which will have been incorporated into Law, before many years!*

---

* The above is scarcely an imaginary case. An intelligent Elder in a Presbyterian church in Brooklyn asked a clergyman there a few days since what his duty was under the Law. For if he must obey it he should be compelled, with his children, to help bind his Wife, when the Southerner came for her.

AN APPLE OF GOLD.

Dr. Jewett, in the course of his travels with his own horse, one day entered a country tavern, and sat down by the bar-room fire to warm his fingers. His keenly roving eye soon discovered, prominent over rows of bottles with highly-colored contents, in large letters, the inscription, "No credit given here." Turning to the landlord, (to whom he was personally unknown,) he said, "Ah! I see that you bring your people square up to the mark here!" "Yes," replied the landlord, "it's no use to trust rum-customers now-a-days. We must get it as we go along, or never get it." Jewett warmed his fingers awhile, and then turning to the other, said: "I think I could add a line or two to your inscription that would make it very nice." "What would you add?" inquired the landlord. "Give me a pen and a piece of paper, and I will show you." "Walk into the bar; there's pen and ink—help yourself." The Doctor walked into the bar, and taking up a pen, wrote as follows:—

"No credit given here,"
And yet I've cause to fear
That there's a Day-book kept in Heaven,
Where charge is made, AND CREDIT GIVEN!

Laying down the pen, and leaving the lines, he walked to the fire, and again sat down, expecting an explosion. The landlord, whose curiosity was somewhat moved, went behind the counter and read what he had written. A pause of some minutes ensued, when the Doctor, glancing round, saw to his great pleasure, and somewhat to his surprise, from the intimations of dampness about the eyes, that he had driven a nail in a "sure place." "A word fitly spoken, how good is it."

TRIUMPH OF FAITH.—During an earthquake that occurred a few years since in the south, the inhabitants of a small village were generally very much alarmed, and at the same time surprised at the calmness and apparent joy of an old lady whom they all knew. At length one of them, addressing the old lady, said,

"Mother ——, are you not afraid?"

"No," said the mother in Israel, "I rejoice to know that I have a God that can shake the world." [Presbyterian.

If we scrutinize the lives of men of genius, we shall find that activity and persistence are their leading peculiarities. Obstacles cannot intimidate, nor labor weary, nor drudgery disgust them.

The Sabbath Recorder.

New York, December 19, 1850.

"DESTINY OF THE WICKED."

To the Editors of the Sabbath Recorder :—

I have read with much interest the articles published in the Recorder under the above head; and, having had considerable difficulty, for a length of time, in reconciling certain scriptures with what are termed evangelical views, I hoped, when I saw one question propounded, that all my difficulties would be removed on reading the answer. But this answer failing to do what I had hoped, I have concluded to show wherein it has failed.

Your VIth proposition is in the form of a question, as follows: "Will the punishment of the wicked consist in annihilation?" When you asked this question, you undoubtedly shaped it to the case you had in view; but it does not fit mine, nor the sentiments of any of those whom I have read favoring annihilation. For such it would be more proper to ask, Will the punishment of the wicked INCLUDE annihilation?—for there is no consistency in supposing that the punishment of the wicked "consists in," or is made up of, annihilation; that is, to reserve them for judgment, raise them, and then put them out of being. I have not been acquainted with such a sentiment; but I have heard and read of those who argue, that the punishment of the wicked includes an entire extinction of being, and that God has willed that this extinction of being shall be the RESULT of the punishment previously inflicted, and not that the punishment shall be made up of annihilation. And the arguments for this view I have found it extremely difficult or impossible to answer. I therefore wish to offer a few thoughts on the article alluded to.

You refer your readers to the terms used in Scripture, which are understood by some to inculcate the doctrine of annihilation, and then you say, "It is certain that some of these terms are not more frequently used in reference to the second death, than they are in reference to the first." And then, after quoting a number of passages in which those terms occur, you say, "The application of such terms to the final condition of the wicked does not prove their annihilation, unless the application of them to the first death also proves annihilation." But it appears to me, that if those terms have the same force when applied to the second death that they have when applied to the first, (which you insinuate,) the advocates of annihilation have no farther labor of importance to do to establish their theory. The terms used in the texts quoted imply extermination from this world. As far as any thing is known of them in this world, they have ceased to be. Their invisible spirits have left the body, and the body has returned to dust, and is no more found. And it would not be unreasonable to suppose, that that is an end of them, did not revelation teach that there is to be a resurrection and another world, to which we are all to be brought; and with this doctrine we are also taught that there is a second death for the wicked. Now, if those terms imply extermination from this world when used in reference to the present state, why not suppose they imply extermination from the world to come when used in reference to that? If the wicked exist at all after they are "destroyed," "perished," "consumed," and have experienced the "second death," is not that existence some where beyond the world to come of which we read? And as those who believe the doctrine of annihilation have no revelation more than others in relation to the place, state, or condition beyond the second death, or that there is a place, state, or condition for such; would it not be natural for them to suppose, that the wicked will cease to be after having passed through the resurrection, and then been punished, "destroyed," "perished," "consumed," and experienced the "second death?" To do this, would they "be driven to the extremity of maintaining that the soul does actually suffer annihilation at death?"

In arguing against the sleep of the dead, you triumphantly ask, "By what power will the soul awake again to receive its merited punishment? Will it awake itself? Is it according to the course of nature, that it should be aroused from its slumber just at that hour and no sooner? Is there some fixed law of our being which will bring it about? Or will it be effected by the working of supernatural power? Certainly the latter." Does this kind of reasoning weigh more against the unconscious state of the dead in the intermediate state, than it does against the resurrection? If it does, I do not understand it. I am a sincere believer in the doctrine of the resurrection, and when you put those questions in relation to that subject, I should, in the end, give the same answer, and think the conclusion not an "absurd" one. But in the hight of inconsistency you treat this conclusion as an "absurdity," and justify those unacquainted with you in supposing you a disbeliever in the resurrection of the dead. Is it more absurd to suppose that an "unconscious soul" requires the "intervention of a miracle" to raise it in the resurrection, than it is to suppose that it requires the same for a conscious one? Is "violence offered to the nature" of one more than to the other? Or, if the soul remains in a conscious state, is it conclusive evidence that it is "according to the course of our nature that it should be aroused" just at the time fixed by God? Or, is that proof conclusive, that there is "some fixed law of our being that will bring it about?" If it is conclusive proof that there is such a law of our being, it still remains to be proved, that the soul is in a conscious state between death and the resurrection, which you have not attempted to do. But if there be any such "law of our being," by which the conscious soul of the dead will raise itself just at the time fixed by God, where is the evidence of the fact? If there is none, (which I suppose to be true,) then by your logic the doctrine of the resurrection is an "absurdity."

Again, you "conclude, therefore," that the soul, at the death of the body, does not sink into a state of unconsciousness. "Therefore"—wherefore do you conclude thus? No reason has been given except that in that case the doctrine of the resurrection would be an "absurdity."

Again, "For as there is no example of annihilation within his own experience, no reason can be drawn from analogy to support the supposition, that the existence of the soul will ever be terminated." Is that a logical reason? Whether it is or not, I think that an opponent might with equal propriety say, that "as there is no example" of the eternal existence of the wicked "within human experience, no reason can be drawn from analogy to support the supposition" that the existence of the soul will be continued after experiencing the second death. Or, as there is no example of the world's destruction by fire within human experience, no reason can be drawn from analogy to support the supposition that it ever will be. These are truths, or they are not. Revelation is our guide, and its teachings reach far beyond all "human experience" or "analogy" drawn from that experience; and as the sentiment before us is of that far-reaching character, neither human experience nor analogy can be brought forward as an argument.

Thus I have given you some of my objections to your reasoning, without arguing the opposite, or assuming that your opinions are incorrect, hoping that these objections may lead some to a closer investigation of this important subject—the final destiny of the wicked. H. C. H.

Remarks.

"H. C. H." says, "It still remains to be proved, that the soul is in a conscious state between death and the resurrection, which you have not attempted to do."

That the soul does not sink into a state of unconsciousness at death, is proved by the following scriptures:—

Phil. 1:21—"For to me, to live is Christ, and to die is gain." In what respect would death be a gain to the believer, if his soul sank immediately to sleep, and remained in that state till the resurrection? Would a Christian desire to fall into that state in which neither soul nor body could be of any service to the Lord for two thousand years, more or less? The Apostle loved his Master too well to cherish any such feeling.

Rom. 8:10—"And if Christ be in you, the body is dead because of sin, but the spirit is life because of righteousness." A plain contrast is here drawn between the condition of the body and that of the spirit or soul. The one dies, crumbles to dust, and is mingled with the earth; the other lives, when the body is dead. This sense is confirmed by the next verse, which promises the resurrection of the dead body in due time. "If the spirit of him that raised up Christ from the dead dwell in you, He that raised up Christ from the dead shall also quicken your mortal bodies by his Spirit that dwelleth in you." The spirit lives without dying, because of righteousness imputed to it; and the body, though dead because of sin, shall be quickened to life again by the Spirit of God, who dwells in the saints.

1 Thess. 4:14—"For if we believe that Jesus died and rose again, even so them also which sleep in Jesus will God bring with him." The most natural construction of this passage is, that Jesus Christ, when he comes to raise the dead, will bring with him the spirits or souls of his people, that they may at once be re-united to their bodies when raised from their graves. They must, therefore, have an existence separate from the body.

Luke 9:30, 31—"And behold there talked with him two men, which were Moses and Elijah, who appeared in glory, and spake of his decease, which he should accomplish at Jerusalem." Whatever may be said of Elijah, as that his body underwent a change equivalent to that which will pass upon the bodies of the living saints at the coming of Christ, the same cannot be pretended of Moses. It is expressly testified, that he gave up his soul at the call of God, when no man was near him, and his body was buried by God himself. Deut. 34:1, 5, 6. To pretend, as some do, that his body was afterwards raised is contrary to that scripture which declares that "Christ is become the first-fruits of them that slept." 1 Cor. 15:20. Christ was the first who rose from the dead to die no more. Nevertheless, Moses was shown to be living and conscious at the time of our Lord's transfiguration. He lived, therefore, not in the body, but in the spirit.

Matt. 10:28—"Fear not them which kill the body, but are not able to kill the soul; but rather fear Him who is able to destroy both soul and body in hell." If language has any meaning, we are here taught that there is a soul in man, which men cannot kill, even though they kill the body. The text also teaches, that the soul cannot be laid to sleep. For the object of the Saviour is to show, that the soul has a preëminence above the body. But if it be simply laid to sleep, the substance of it still existing, the same may be said of the body. The particles of which the body is composed are not destroyed. Where, then, is the preëminence of the soul above the body?

Luke 20:38—"God is not the God of the dead, but of the living; for all live unto him." These words are a part of our Saviour's address to "certain of the Sadducees"—a sect which said, that there was no resurrection, neither angel, nor spirit. See Acts 23:8. They held, that the souls of men did not exist in a state of separation from their bodies, and that the rewards and punishments, mentioned in Scripture, related only to this life. The object of the Saviour was to confute their doctrine. In doing so, he lays hold of a passage which as certainly proves the present, living, conscious existence of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, as it does their ultimate resurrection. If God cannot be the God of the dead, then there was a sense in which Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob were not dead, when God spake to Moses from the bush. If he is the God of the living only, then there was a sense in which they were then living, notwithstanding they were dead in the common acceptation of the term. They must, therefore, have been living in a state of separation from the body. There is no evading this argument, except upon the Swedenborgian theory, that every man enters upon the resurrection state immediately after death. But if the patriarchs entered upon the resurrection state as soon as they died, Christ is not "the first fruits of them that slept."

Luke 23:42, 43—The thief on the cross said to Jesus, "Lord, remember me, when thou comest into thy kingdom. And Jesus said unto him, Verily, I say unto thee, To-day shalt thou be with me in Paradise!" Paradise evidently denotes the place of happy spirits. See 2 Cor. 12:4. Rev. 2:7. The dying thief was to find his abode there that very day. Great pains have been taken to show, that the punctuation should be altered, and that the comma should be placed after the word to day, instead of before it. What a worthless criticism!—such as a good cause cannot need, and even a bad cause ought to be ashamed of it. The fact is, it was a common opinion among the Jews, that the souls of the righteous, who were very eminent in piety, were carried immediately into Paradise. In their solemn prayers, when one dies, they say, "Let him have his portion in Paradise, and also in the world to come"—plainly distinguishing between the separate state and the state of the resurrection. If such was the signification of the term among the Jews, there is no doubt that our Saviour used it in its well-known and common sense, so that the penitent thief would readily understand him, it being, as Dr. Watts says, "a promise of grace in his dying hour, wherein he had no long time to study hard for the sense of it, or consult the critics in order to find the meaning."

2 Cor. 5:6, 8—"Therefore we are always confident, knowing that whilst we are at home in the body, we are absent from the Lord. We are confident, I say, and willing rather to be absent from the body, and present with the Lord." The Apostle in this connection intimates, that it would be his choice to be clothed at once with immortality, in soul and body, without dying or being unclothed. But since it was otherwise ordered, his next choice is to be "absent from the body and present with the Lord." If such language does not express the conscious existence and happiness of the spirits of good men in a state of separation from their bodies, it is difficult to conceive what would.

2 Pet. 1:13, 14—"Yea, I think it meet, as long as I am in this tabernacle, to stir you up by putting you in remembrance; knowing that shortly I must put off this my tabernacle." Here the soul, or thinking principle, is represented as something plainly distinct from the body, the latter being but the tent, or tabernacle, in which the former sojourns. The language of the Apostle is very strong, and implies that the body was not Peter, but Peter was the living, thinking, conscious being who dwelt in that body, and would soon put it off.

To these scriptures let us add what is said concerning the rich man and Lazarus. Luke 16:19, 31. They are represented as living after death in a state of consciousness, the one in comfort, the other in torment. The scene is placed between death and the resurrection; for the rich man had five brethren still living, enjoying the ministry of Moses and the prophets. It may be that the account is but a parable; nevertheless, the parable is founded upon the existence of souls in a state of separation from the body, while other men dwell on earth. The design of it is to show that a ghost sent from the other world, whether from heaven or hell, would have no influence to convert men, if they reject the ordinary means of grace. But if souls have no existence in a separate state, the design of the parable is lost. What motive could the rich man's family have to hearken to a spirit from the other world, if there were no spirits existing there? It may be said, that the parable was spoken in reference to the popular belief which had obtained among the Jews. But if that belief was a false one, He who came to bear witness to the truth would have corrected it. He would never have availed himself of it in such a way as to create the impression that it was well founded.

We might quote other texts, but we have presented enough, in our opinion, to convince any unprejudiced mind. And having spent so much time upon this point, which is fundamental to the main argument, we reserve what we have to say farther till next week.

MISSIONARY INTELLIGENCE.

Interesting letters from the Missionaries of the American Board, stationed in various parts of the world, were read on the evening of the first Monday in December, at the agency of the Board in New York.

Mr. Bushnell writes from Gaboon River, South Africa, July 20, giving an account of a recent tour up that river, among the Mpongwe, Bakali and Shekani tribes. Mr. B. had also made a voyage of two weeks duration to Fernando Po, where he recommends the establishment of a station. Two tribes had recently engaged in a fierce and sanguinary battle, in which thirty-five prisoners were led out by their captors and slaughtered in the most inhuman manner. On the west side of the island, Mr. B. visited the Boobies, the aboriginees of the island—a race much more degraded than any he had seen on the continent, having no idea of a Supreme Being. The English Baptists have had stations at three different places in Fernando Po, but all are now abandoned. The missionaries all died or left.

A letter recently received from Foochow, China, states that three missionaries from other societies have entered that field, and have secured premises within the walls of the city. Their right to such a privilege is being contested before the legal authorities, or between the English Consul and the Provincial officers.

Mr. Williams, at Canton, Aug. 22, says, that the revision of the New Testament has been completed, and that of the Old begun. The words for God and Spirit are not translated. The Bible and Missionary Societies are to have the responsibility of deciding what terms shall be adopted.

Mr. Bliss, of Erzeroom, Turkey, describes a tour to Diarbekir, in the course of which he was almost universally received with favor. In one or two instances, where strong opposition was manifested by the Turkish priests, the Porte interfered in behalf of the missionaries, commanding the Pasha to extend protection to Protestants of every nation.

POPERY AND PROTESTANTISM.

It is not surprising that the Pope's attempt to establish bishoprics in England has created great excitement and aroused violent opposition. The clashing of interests and prerogatives which must necessarily result from partitioning that already divided estate, would naturally produce just the hubbub that is witnessed. But we cannot help wondering at the excitement which has been got up in this country, by a popish movement which need affect nobody's interests or prerogatives. Several weeks ago, John Hughes, the Catholic Bishop of New York, delivered in this city a discourse on the "Decline of Protestantism;" and from that circumstance, which would have been forgotten in a month if left to itself, has sprung an anti-popery excitement of almost unprecedented extent. In numerous places, throughout the country, sermons have been preached in review of the Bishop's positions; and we can scarcely take up a newspaper which does not contain something upon the subject. One evening last week, a great meeting was held in the Broadway Tabernacle, New York, under the auspices of the American and Foreign Christian Union, at which addresses, in denunciation of Romanism, and in glorification of Protestantism, were delivered by five or six clergymen. All these movements, we doubt not, are viewed with unfeigned satisfaction by leading members of the Romish Church; and they understand too well what is for the interest of that church, to allow them to cease through want of additional food for excitement. If half the time and effort which have been devoted to the annihilation of the Bishop's sermon, had been expended in the way of practically exhibiting the spirit of Protestantism, the result would have been ten-fold more auspicious for the cause in which so much interest is professed.

Some good, however, has resulted from this discussion. The peculiarities, tendencies, and fruits of Protestantism, have been brought before the people in a very forcible and lucid manner, which cannot fail to produce desirable results. Perhaps no one discourse has embodied so much that is really valuable and useful as that of Rev. Dr. Berg, of Philadelphia, editor of the Protestant Review. From that discourse we copy

A Definition of Protestantism.

First, let us settle what we mean by Protestantism. Bishop Hughes is at a loss for a definition that will answer "the purpose of logical or theological accuracy," though in its popular sense, he owns, the term is understood. This difficulty arises in his mind from the great diversity of the phases of Protestantism; there are so many Protestant sects that a scientific man is puzzled to know what this thing you call Protestantism is. I propose to answer this question, first, by asking another. What is LIGHT? Suppose this inquiry to be made by an unfortunate man, who has lived all his life, like one possessed, among the tombs, or who has, by a strange perversion of reason, or by the stress of circumstances and early prejudices, deliberately chosen a subterranean habitation. He is suddenly brought out into the sunshine, and dazzled and blinded by the subtile agent which brings tears from his eyes, he asks with peevish impatience, "What is this thing you call LIGHT?" He sees it, or blinks at it, as its rays fall upon the prism which hangs before his bleared eye-balls, and he cries out with indignant amazement, What a confusion of colors! What a worse than confounded and confounding blending of tints and hues! Here this thing you call LIGHT looks blue—and here it is azure—and there it kindles into purple—now it glows in crimson, and then it is yellow, and anon it is as green as the grass in the Emerald Isle! What is this thing you call LIGHT? Away with the nondescript! Give me my subterranean shade! Now, what is Protestantism? It is the light of God's truth! The effulgence that kindles in the inner man, as the soul is baptized in the glow of revealed religion! It is the religion of the Bible! The form which it takes, or the hue which it assumes, depends upon the structure, and the capacity, and the conditions of the mind which receives it. It strikes this man's conscience and heart, and he is a Methodist—warm and red, and glowing, and vocal; it falls upon another, and he is a Presbyterian—true, regular, blue; it comes upon another like the light azure tint of water, and he is a Baptist; and so through all the bright and ever varying, yet all-glorious colors of the moral rainbow, it produces variety without the sacrifice of real unity. It is God's bow in the clouds that hangs lowering over the land, the beacon of the covenant, promising that the flood of Popery shall never again deluge the earth, or steep it in blood and sorrow! The blending of all the prismatic colors is seen in the bright, colorless light; and the moral influence of all the varieties of evangelical Christianity is perceptible in the general intelligence—the happiness, the piety, shedding peace, and contentment, and GLORY, upon the land—divesting Protestantism of all sectarian hue, by making holy living the essence of the religion which it universally prescribes. These men who cannot tell what Protestantism is, are the same who "love darkness rather than light—who hate the light and will not come to it, lest their deeds be reproved!" The same who suppress and forbid the free circulation of the Scriptures—who burn the Bible, and curse and anathematize all who read it without their perversions, and without their permission.

GUY FAWKES AND ANTI-POPERY.

The fifth of November—Guy Fawkes' day—the anniversary of the Gunpowder Plot—was celebrated in England this year with unusual pomp. By connecting the event which it commemorates with the recent papal movements, sufficient interest was awakened to enlist the ingenuity of those who had heretofore lost all care about the matter. In nearly every large town some kind of display was got up; but we have seen notices of none more ingenious and suggestive than the following, which is described in "Bell's Life in London:"—

About noon, there issued from the purlieus of Farringdon Market into Fleet street, a "group of Guys," which, as well from their colossal size, as by the amusement and laughter they occasioned in their progress through the streets, must be fairly pronounced the pageant of the day. This group had evidently been "got up" by some zealous anti-Romanists, regardless of cost. It consisted of about 14 figures, animate and inanimate, presided over by a colossal Guy, about 16 feet in height, who, elevated in his chariot—a van drawn by two horses—was compelled to bow down considerably before he could be made to pass beneath Temple Bar. This pageant included an accurate effigy of the new Cardinal Archbishop of Westminster, attired in the canonical robes of the Romish church, and wearing the red and broad-brimmed hat appertaining to his office. The cardinal was supported on the right by a waggish fellow, habited in the robes of a nun, and upon the left by a jolly fat monk, who leered impudently under his mask at the passers by. There was also a second figure, of a monk looking very lugubriously, and labelled "St. Guy, the martyr!" An inanimate figure, holding a brush and a pail of whitewash, inscribed, "Holy Water for the Penitent!"—a man in barrister's robes, and three or four masks, completed the group. The van bore two large inscriptions—the one, "Cardinal St. Impudence going to take possession of his diocese in Westminster," and the other, "Guy Fawkes going to be canonized in St. George's Fields;" and several smaller ones, such as "No Popery," &c. On its appearance in Fleet street, this group attracted an immense crowd, who greeted it with loud cheers and laughter. Several police officers were in attendance, and, accompanying the procession to the confines of the city, gave to it something of an official character.

THE COMMON COUNCIL OF CHICAGO AND THE FUGITIVE SLAVE LAW.—A special meeting of the Common Council of the city of Chicago, Ill., was held on the 26th ult., for the purpose of taking final action upon the various resolutions before that body on the subject of the Fugitive Slave Law. The resolutions, (forbidding the officers of the city from engaging in arresting fugitives,) heretofore adopted and afterward reconsidered, were brought up for action, and the following preamble and resolution were adopted in their stead—by a vote of ten to three:

Whereas, The Fugitive Slave Act, recently passed by Congress, is revolting to our moral sense, and an outrage upon our feelings of justice and humanity, because it disregards all the securities which the Constitution and laws have thrown around personal liberty, and its direct tendency is to alienate the people from their love and reverence for the Government and institutions of our country; therefore,

Resolved, That as the Supreme Court of the United States solemnly adjudged that State officers are under no obligations to fulfill duties imposed upon them as such officers, by acts of Congress, we do not therefore consider it our duty, or the duty of the city officers of the city of Chicago, to aid or assist in the arrest of fugitives from oppression; and by withholding such aid and assistance, we do not believe that our harbor appropriations will be withheld, our railroad injured, our commerce destroyed, or that treason would be committed against the Government.

NEW LICENSE LAW IN VERMONT.—The Legislature of Vermont, at its recent session, repealed all former laws regulating the sale of liquors, and enacted a new statute on that subject, of which the following, says the N. Y. Evangelist, are some of the provisions:—

The sale of intoxicating liquors is prohibited absolutely, except for medical, chemical, and mechanical purposes; the Selectmen of the several towns are the Licensing Board for their respective towns, and they may license not more than two persons in each to sell liquor, for medical, chemical, and mechanical purposes only. No innkeeper or grocer shall have a license to sell liquors, even for medical purposes. Instead of granting a medical license as above named, to one or two persons, the town may, by vote, at the March meeting, authorize the Selectmen to appoint one or two agents to purchase and sell liquors for medicinal purposes; said agents to pay into the town treasury all money received for said liquors, and the town shall pay such agents a reasonable compensation for doing the business. Penalty for selling over twenty gallons, $20—under twenty gallons, $10. On the second, or any subsequent conviction, the penalty is doubled.

BADLY BURNED.—On the evening of the 19th ult., Samuel Wells, Esq., of Genesee, Allegany Co., N. Y., was severely burned by the bursting of a camphene lamp which he was filling. The camphene flew upon his clothes, and taking fire from the lamp, instantly enveloped him in a sheet of flame. He ran from the house, and rolled in the snow, without effect, and then ran across the road, where he was met by Dr. W. C. Bailey, with a pail of water, with which he succeeded in extinguishing the flame. He was badly burned from head to foot, but is now recovering, and is considered out of danger. J. B.

BROWN UNIVERSITY.—The catalogue of this Institution for the present year indicates a prosperous condition. The whole number of students is 174, of whom over 60 have entered since the last Commencement. They came from seventeen different States; the largest number, 63, from Massachusetts; the next largest, 51, from Rhode Island. New York sends 14, New Hampshire 12. One comes from the Ionian Islands, and one from India. Under the new arrangement, the classification of the students is as follows: Latin Language, 76; French, 63; Greek, 49; Chemistry, 48; History, 40; Geometry, 42; Natural Philosophy, 36; Intellectual Philosophy, 85; Logic, 31; Algebra, 20; German Language, 13; Rhetoric, 12; Civil Engineering, 10; Calculus, 4.

EDUCATION AMONG THE CHEROKEES.—Education among the Cherokees appears, from the report ot the Superintendant of Public Schools, recently submitted to the National Council, to be making the most gratifying progress. In 22 schools established in the several districts, there are upwards of 1,000 male and female scholars under instruction, of whom 120 are orphans, who are clothed and boarded at the expense of the Orphan School. Of the several classes in the schools, there are 35 pupils in the alphabetical class; 168 in the spelling class; 553 in the reading class; 50 in the class of history; 314 in the writing class; 210 in the grammar class; 478 in the arithmetic; and 207 in the class of geography. The most advanced of these scholars are to be received into the High Schools, which will soon go into operation.

SAILING OF MISSIONARIES.—Rev. Mr. Dunmore and his wife sailed from Boston, one day last week, for Smyrna, in the bark Ionia. They are expecting to join the Mission to the Armenians of Turkey, sustained by the American Board. They will commence a new station at Diarbekir, where, it is said, there is much encouragement for missionary labor at the present time. Rev. Messrs. J. A. Frazier and Gulian Lansing, with their wives, also sailed from Boston for Smyrna, in the bark Utah. They are sent out by the General Associate Reformed Synod of the West, and by the Associate Reformed Synod of New York, to join Rev. James Barnet and Dr. J. G. Paulding, at Damascus.

FEMALE ENTERPRISE IN INDIA.—One of our exchanges says that in Bansberia, Bengal, the wife of a devoted native catechist, connected with the Free Church of Scotland, has established a school of her own for the instruction and salvation of her countrywomen. Such an institution, we believe, has never before existed in that region, and this is probably almost a solitary instance of a native Bengali woman who has energy and zeal enough to impel her to such an enterprise. It has, thus far, been eminently successful.

REVIVAL IN NEW JERSEY.—Mr. E. C. Ambler furnishes the N. Y. Recorder with some account of a revival now in progress at Millington, N. J. Deep seriousness had pervaded the congregation since last fall, and occasional conversions had occurred. At length a series of meetings was held, which proved interesting and effective. Between thirty and forty persons have recently been baptized.

ARRIVAL OF MISSIONARIES.—The bark R. Adams arrived at New York on the 11th inst. from Fernando Po, (West coast of Africa,) bringing the following passengers, attached to the Gaboon mission, under the care of the American Board: Mr. Ira M. Preston, Mrs. Jane F. Preston, Miss Jane Cowper.

BAPTIST HOME MISSIONS.—The receipts of the Baptist Home Missionary Society have of late fallen so far short of the demands upon the Society, that the Board have been compelled to pass a vote contracting their appropriations until the state of the treasury shall be improved.

A MISSIONARY TURNED EDITOR.—The N. Y. Recorder learns that Rev. T. W. Tobey, formerly a missionary of the Southern Board to China, and at present pastor of the Baptist Church at Raleigh, N. The Chair laid before the Senate a message from the President, enclosing communication from the Mexican Minister, in relation to incursions of Indians upon Mexican citizens, and asking that the provisions of the eleventh article of the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo be carried out by the United States; referred to Committee on Military Affairs.

In the House of Representatives, Standing Committees were announced, nearly the same as those of last session. Resolutions referring the several parts of the President's Message to the appropriate committees, gave occasion for a brief discussion of the subject of slavery. Mr. Giddings moved the reference to the Judiciary Committee of so much of the Message as relates to our domestic policy; and in the course of remarks in support of this motion, he denounced the fugitive law, and said that the people of his district would die before they would assist in executing it. Mr. McClernand spoke on the other side, charging those who oppose the law with being revolutionary, seditious, and treasonable. The motion of Mr. Giddings was voted down, and the Message was referred to the usual committees.

THIRD-DAY, Dec. 10.

In the Senate, Mr. Butler introduced a bill to refund to South Carolina the monies advanced in 1838 to support troops engaged in the Seminole war; referred to Military Committee. Several other bills were introduced and referred. Unsuccessful efforts were made to make the River and Harbor bill and the Cheap Postage bill the order for Fourth-day, and the bill giving to every head of a family a farm, the order for next Second-day. The House went into Committee of the Whole, and a motion to take up the River and Harbor bill was negatived. Wood, Representative of the Sixth Congressional District of Ohio, which took place at his residence on the 19th of Nov. last. The deceased was a native of New York, and removed to Ohio in 1825. Mr. Potter passed a eulogium on his memory and offered the customary resolutions of respect, which were adopted, and the House adjourned.

FIFTH-DAY, Dec. 12.

Robert Gray, discoverer of Columbia River, asking land in Oregon for her husband's services. Mr. Bell introduced a bill granting pensions and half pay to certain Creek volunteers, who served in the military service of the United States; debated and postponed. The Senate took up Mr. Bradbury's resolutions, calling on the President for the reasons for the removal of public officers, &c., and talked considerably on the subject, but without doing any thing, adjourned over to Second-day.

In the House, the Post Office Committee reported a resolution to appoint a Special Agent to proceed to California and receive bids for postal service in California and Oregon, which was ordered to a third reading, after an unsuccessful motion to lay it on the table. THE CHOLERA IN JAMAICA.—A correspondent of the Post, writing from Kingston, Jamaica, Nov. 30, says:—

"The cholera has been an awful visitation to us. In this city, of 40,000, about one-tenth of the population have fallen. In the small town of Port Royal, upward of one-fourth have died; and in Spanish Town there has been nearly a like proportion. It has in a great measure subsided here. The deaths have diminished from 250 a day, probably the maximum of one day's mortality, to 27, which I believe was that of last night. In Port Royal it wholly subsided eight or ten days ago; and it is nearly or altogether the same in Spanish Town. It is raging in other districts, and I doubt not that though it is about leaving Kingston and its vicinity, it will accomplish a deadly work in other districts ere it be exhausted. The mortality has been chiefly among the lower classes. The negroes, in their low filthy houses, with their bad habits, and disadvantages of all sorts, have been the chief victims. There have been comparatively few deaths of persons in good positions; but these have been increasing latterly, and we all live under considerable apprehension."

Seven Days Later from Europe.

The steamship America, with one week later intelligence from all parts of Europe, arrived at Boston on the 12th inst.

The gale of the week previous to the sailing of the America proved exceedingly destructive along the English and Irish coasts. Among a vast number of other vessels reported, the emigrant ship Edmund, from London, was driven on shore near Limerick, and 96 out of 216 passengers were lost.

At Worthing, during the same gale, a large dismasted bark, the Lalla Rookh, East Indiaman, homeward-bound, with a valuable cargo, was descried at anchor about two miles from the shore, riding heavily, with two anchors ahead, and signals of distress flying. A gallant crew of 11 men, the most experienced fishermen of the town, nobly volunteered to put off to her assistance, and their praiseworthy object seemed on the point of being accomplished, when a sea struck their boat, and in an instant she disappeared, involving all hands on board in a watery grave.

The schooner Queen of London, from Cardiff, was also totally lost on Phillack Beach, and the whole of her crew perished. From the size of the boat that was washed on shore, the vessel is supposed to have been about 150 tuns burthen. The crew were distinctly heard crying for assistance, but none could then be rendered. Nothing more of the vessel or crew was seen or heard.

TRAGEDY IN ARKANSAS.—A Mr. Elzy Taylor, of Jefferson County, Arkansas, said to be an industrious citizen, recently rendered himself obnoxious to some of his neighbors by entering Government land on which improvements had been made. The settlement compelled him to re-convey the land; but a short time afterwards the feud broke out afresh, and being pursued by three men armed with rifles, two of whom discharging their rifles shot his horse, he turned, and with a double barreled gun shot two of the party, and then fled. The Little Rock Democrat, from which the foregoing is gleaned, thinks Taylor, if caught, will be less in danger from the law than from the fury of his neighbors, who, it is supposed, will be satisfied with nothing short of his life.

THE GIBBS FORTUNE IN ENGLAND.—Benjamin Gibbs Mitchell, formerly of Baltimore, and more recently from Bermuda, claims the fortune of eight millions of dollars, which has remained in England many years without an owner, the rightful heir not being known. Mr. Mitchell has been in England the past year, and has made his claim to the title so clear, that he no longer doubts that he shall obtain the money. He arrived in Hartford, Conn., recently, to procure certain evidence touching his identity.

SINGULAR AFFAIR.—The Philadelphia correspondent of the N. Y. Tribune says that a singular and rather serious affair occurred in Spring Garden early on Friday morning, Dec. 13. On that morning a newspaper carrier found the front door of Mrs. Emily Quinn's house, in Green-st. below Broad, open. The carrier suspecting that burglars were in the house, he informed John W. Young, one of the Police Marshal's Police, of his suspicion. Mr. Y. obtained the assistance of Isaac Hulsehart, watchman, and James Whitaker, citizen, and entered the house, after ringing the door-bell. While groping their way up stairs in the dark, a pistol in the officer's hand was discharged. By this time the inmates of the house, consisting of a number of females and two men, named Wm. Gest and Thomas Fitzpatrick, were aroused by the noise, and supposing that the house had been invaded by desperate thieves, they endeavored to escape. Five females sprang from the second story windows of the dwelling into the yard, in their night-clothes, while Gest, making his exit in the same manner, ran with all speed to the station-house to secure assistance. Upon the arrival of Gest and the officers at the dwelling, the officers and citizens who first entered the dwelling were found industriously engaged in searching for thieves. The result of the above singular and unfortunate transaction is, that one female is very seriously injured, another is confined to her bed from the effects of the fright, and that Young, Hulsehart and Whitaker have been held to bail in $100 each to answer the charge of misdemeanor.

THE GLOUCESTER FISHING FLEET.—The Boston Traveler says that since the 1st inst., about 12 vessels have been sold at Gloucester to go to Cape Cod and ports in Maine. These vessels have brought fair prices, varying from $2,000 to $4,000 each. To replace these and to keep the fleet good, 20 vessels have been lately contracted for at Essex to go to Gloucester. These will be clipper vessels, of the most superior model and finish, from 70 to 90 tons burthen, at a cost of about $4,000 each. The ship-builders at Essex have contracts for all the vessels they can build for several months to come. The fleet from Gloucester the next year will consist of about 200 vessels, of 70 tons each, employing nearly 2,000 men. The fisheries at Gloucester are managed with a skill and enterprise not surpassed in the United States.

A NEW ISSUE.—In Cuba, (Angelica,) Allegany Co., in this State, on the 7th inst., the ticket for Corporation officers, entirely composed of Odd Fellows, was defeated by one from which the members of the Order were excluded, which was headed "People's Anti-Odd Fellows' Ticket," and carried by an average majority of 52. A third ticket was run composed of a majority of the Odd Fellows on the first ticket, with some who did not belong to or sympathize with the fraternity. No party issue was raised. [Trib.

SUMMARY.

Thomas Mitchell, Postmaster, at West Fowler, St. Lawrence Co., N. Y., was brought to Utica in custody of a special agent of the Department, under arrest for robbing the United States Mail. It appears that for several months past, packages passing over the route between Watertown and Canada, directed to New York, Philadelphia, &c., have been abstracted, and, upon inquiry, it was clearly ascertained that Mitchell was the guilty person. The Commissioner, after a brief hearing, required the prisoner to give bail in the amount of $3,000, which failing to do, he was committed. [Tribune.

The N. Y. Tribune has received dates from Lima and Callao, Peru, to the 8th Nov. The only important news is the opening of the first Railroad in the Republic, between Callao and Lima, a distance of six miles. The enterprise was considered a great undertaking, but the commencement of its operation was attended by a melancholy accident—the locomotive running off the track, killing one man, and wounding a number of others. DIED.

At Southampton, Ill., on the 26th of November, of typhus fever, JAMES C. BUTTS, son of John R. and Lorana Butts, aged 22 years. He made a profession of religion when twelve years old, and joined the Seventh-day Baptist Church in Otselic. Removing to the West, he was among the constituents of the Farmington Church, and is the first of that little band who has been called to join the church above. He had for several years suffered from what was supposed to be an affection of the liver, and for a few months had been in a measure laid aside from business. In the early stage of his illness he had a strong desire to live, but towards the end he was calm, and resigned to the will of God.

In Great Valley, Cattaraugus Co., N. Y., Nov. 20, of a lingering illness, Dea. CHARLES WARD, in the fifty-ninth year of his age. Dea. Ward formerly belonged to the First-day Baptist denomination. A few years since he became convinced that the seventh day of the week was the only Sabbath of the Bible, and accordingly he embraced it, and united with the first Seventh-day Baptist Church in Genesee, where he remained a worthy member until he was called to join the church triumphant. In Berlin, Rensselaer Co., N. Y., on the 22d of Nov., 1850, of consumption, ANNIS GREENMAN, wife of Geo. N. Greenman, and daughter of Lodowick and Elizabeth Saunders, in the 45th year of her age. Mrs. Greenman experienced religion at the age of eighteen years, and has been a consistent Christian through life. We hope and believe she has gone to dwell with her Redeemer, whom she loved and served.

Miscellaneous.

☞ Funeral obsequies for the late Col. Richard M. Johnson were held by the Tammany Society, at Tammany Hall, N. Y., on the 6th inst. The following Requiem, written by Gen. Morris, was sung on the occasion:—

"Man dieth and wasteth away,
And where is he?" Hark! from the skies
I hear a voice answer and say—
"The spirit of man never dies."
His body, which came from the earth,
Must mingle again with the sod;
His soul, which in heaven had birth,
Returns to the bosom of God.

No terror has death or the grave,
To those who believe in the Lord—
Who know the Redeemer can save,
And lean on the faith of his word:
While ashes to ashes, and dust
We give unto dust, in our gloom,
The light of salvation we trust,
Which hangs like a lamp in the tomb.

O Lord God Almighty! to thee
We turn as our solace above;
The waters may fail from the sea,
But never thy fountain of love:
O teach us thy will to obey,
And sing with one heart and accord—
He gave, and he taketh away,
And praised be the name of the Lord.

The Last Day of School.

From "The District School as it Was, by One who went to it."

The district school as it was generally closed, in the Winter, with what was called an "examination." This was usually attended by the minister of the town, the committee who engaged the teacher, and such of the parents as chose to come in. Very few, however, were sufficiently interested in the improvement of their children, to spend three uncomfortable hours in the hot and crowded school-room, listening to the same dull round of words, year after year. If the school had been under the care of a good instructor, all was well of course; if a poor one, it was too late to help it. Or, perhaps they thought they could not afford the time on a fair afternoon; and, if the weather was stormy, it was rather more agreeable to stay at home; beside, "Nobody else will be there; and why should I go?" Whether such were the reflections of parents or not, scarcely more than half of them, at most, ever attended the examination. I do not recollect that the Summer school was examined at all. I know not the reason of this omission, unless it was that such had been the custom from time immemorial.

We shall suppose it to be the last day of the Winter school. The scholars have on their better clothes, if their parents are somewhat particular, or if the every-day dress "looks quite too bad." The young ladies, especially, wear the next best gown, and a more cleanly and tastefully worked neckerchief. Their hair displays more abundant curls and a more elaborate adjustment.

It is noon. The school-room is undergoing the operation of being swept as clean as a worn-out broom in the hands of one girl, and hemlock twigs in the hands of others, will permit. Whew—what a dust! Alas for Mary's cape, so snow-white and smooth in the morning! Hannah's curls, which lay so close to each other, and so pat and still on her temples, have got loose by the exercise, and have stretched themselves into the figure of half-straightened cork-screws, nearly unfit for service. The spirit of the house-wife dispossesses the bland and smiling spirit of the school-girl. The masculine candidates for matrimony can now give a shrewd guess who are endued with an innate propensity to scold; who will be Xantippes to their husbands, should they ever get their Cupid's nests made up again so as to catch them. "Be still, Sam, bringing in snow," screams Mary. "Get away, boys, off out doors, or I'll sweep you into the fire," snaps out Hannah, as she brushes the urchins' legs with her hemlock. "There, take that," screeches Margaret, as she gives a provoking lubber a knock with the broom-handle; "there, take that, and keep your wet, dirty feet, down off the seats."

The sweeping and scolding are at length done. The girls are now brushing their clothes, by flapping handkerchiefs over themselves and each other. The dust is subsiding; one can almost breathe again. The master has come, all so prim, with his best coat and a clean cravat; and, may be, a collar is stiff and high above it. His hair is combed in its genteelest curvatures. He has returned earlier than usual, and the boys are cut short in their play—the glorious fun of the last noon-time. But what shall the visitors sit on? "Go up to Captain Clark's, and borrow some chairs," says the master. Half a dozen boys are off in a moment, and next, more than half a dozen chairs are sailing, swinging, and clattering through the air, and set in a row round the spelling-floor.

The school are at length all seated at their books, in palpitating expectation. The master makes a speech on the importance of speaking up, "loud and distinct," and of refraining from whispering, and all other things well known to be forbidden. The writing-books and ciphering manuscripts are gathered and piled on the desk, or the bench near it. "Where is your manuscript, Margaret?" "I carried it home last night." "Carried it home!—what's that for?" "'Cause I was ashamed on't—I haven't got half so far in 'rethmetic as the rest of the girls who cipher, I've had to stay at home so much."

A heavy step is heard in the entry. All is hushed within. The door opens—it is nobody but one of the largest boys, who went home at noon. There are sleigh-bells approaching—hark! do they stop? yes, up in Captain Clark's shed. Now there is another tread, then a distinct and confident rap. The master opens the door, and the minister salutes him, and, advancing, receives the simultaneous bows and courtesies of the awed ranks in front. He is seated in the most conspicuous and honorable place, perhaps in the magisterial desk. Then some of the neighbors scatter in, and receive the same homage, though it is proffered with a more careless action and aspect.

Now commences the examination. First, the younger classes read and spell. Observe that little fellow, as he steps from his seat to take his place on the floor. It is his day of public triumph, for he is at the head; he has been there the most times, and a ninepence swings by a flaxen string from his neck. His skin wants letting out, it will hardly hold the important young gentleman. His mother told him, this morning, when he left home, "to speak up like a minister," and his shrill oratory is almost at the very pinnacle of utterance. The third class have read. They are now spelling. They are famous orthographers; the mightiest words of the spelling columns do not intimidate them. Then come the numbers, the abbreviations, and the punctuation. Some of the little throats are almost choked by the hurried ejaculation of big words and stringy sentences.

The master has gone through with the several accomplishments of the class. They are about to take their seats. "Please let them stand a few moments longer; I should like to put out a few words to them, myself," says the minister. Now, look out. They expect words as long as their fingers, from the widest columns of the spelling-book, or perhaps such as are found only in the dictionary. "Spell wrist," says he to the little sweller at the head. "O, what an easy word!" R-i-s-t, wrist. It is not right. The next, the next—they all try, or rather do not attempt the word; for if r-i-s-t does not spell wrist, they cannot conceive what does. "Spell gown, Anna." G-o-u-n-d. "O no, it is gown, not gound. The next try." None of them can spell this. He then puts out penknife, which is spelt without the k, and then andiron, which his honor at the head rattles off in this way, "h-a-n-d hand, i-u-r-n, hand-iurn."

The poor little things are confused as well as discomfited. They hardly know what it means. The teacher is disconcerted and mortified. It dawns on him, that while he has been following the order of the book, and priding himself that so young scholars can spell such monstrous great words—words which perhaps they will never use—they cannot spell the names of the most familiar objects. The minister has taught him a lesson.

The writing-books are now examined. The mighty pile is lifted from the desk and scattered along through the hands of the visitors. Some are commended for the neatness with which they have kept their manuscripts; some for improvement in writing; of some, probably of the majority, is said nothing at all.

"Whew!" softly breathed the minister, as he opened a writing-book, some of whose pages were a complete ink-souse. He looked on the outside, and Simon Patch was the name that lay sprawling in the dirt which adhered to the newspaper cover. Simon spied his book in the reverend gentleman's hands, and noticed his queer stare at it. The minister looked up; Simon shrunk and looked down, for he felt that his eye was about to seek him. He gazed intensely in the book before him, without seeing a word, at the same time earnestly sucking the pointed lapel of his Sunday coat. But Simon escaped without any audible rebuke.

Now comes the arithmetical examination; that is, the proficients in this branch are required to say the rules. Alas me! I had no reputation at all in this science. I could not repeat more than half the rules I had been over, nor more than half of that half in the words of the book, as others could. What shame and confusion of face were mine on the last day, when we came to be questioned in Arithmetic! But when Mr. Ellis had his examination, I looked up a little, and felt that I was not so utterly incompetent as my previous teachers, together with myself, had supposed.

Then came the display in Grammar, our knowledge of which is especially manifested in parsing. A piece is selected which we have parsed in the course of the school, and on which we are again drilled so as to become as familiar with the parts of speech, and the governments and agreements of which, as we are with the buttons and button-holes of our jackets. We appear, of course, amazingly expert.

We exhibited our talent at reading likewise, in passages selected for the occasion, and conned over, and read over, until the dullest might call all the words right, and the most careless mind all the "stops and marks."

But this examination was a stupid piece of business to me, as is evident enough from this stupid account of it. The expectation and preparation were somewhat exhilerating, as I trust has been perceived; but, as soon as the anticipated scene had commenced, it grew dull, and still more dull, just like this chapter.

But let us finish this examination, now we are about it. Suppose it finished then. The minister remarks to the teacher, "Your school appears very well, in general, sir;" then he makes a speech, then a prayer, and his business is done. So is that of school-master and school. "You are dismissed," is uttered for the last time this season. It is almost dark, and but little time left for a last trip-up, snow-ball, or slide-down-hill. The little boys and girls, with their books and dinner baskets, ride home with their parents, if they happen to be there. The larger ones have some last words and laughs together, and then they leave the Old School-House till December comes round again.

A "Snail Telegraph."

The Paris correspondent of the Literary Gazette writes:—

"I have an astounding announcement to make to you. The marvels of the electric telegraph are annihilated, and the means of instantaneous communication between man and man, at any distance whatsoever, even at the extremities of the earth, has been discovered! Yes, the last and most majestic of human discoveries has fallen from its hight almost at the very moment at which it dawned on the world, and it is replaced by one a thousandfold more glorious, and which, if it only partially realize the promise of its commencement, will totally change the face of the world! And the means by which this wonderful thing is done are even more wonderful than the thing itself; snails, aye, snails; galvanic and magnetic influence! Do not think that I am hoaxing you; it is on the authority of the Presse that I speak, one of the most important newspapers of Europe in talent, character and circulation; and it is not to be believed that such a journal would be a party to an impudent and stupid attempt to bamboozle the public. In its numbers of Friday, the 25th, and Saturday the 26th ult., there are two feuilletons signed by M. Jules Allix, No. 92 Rue Richelieu, roundly, formally, positively asserting, that the secret of affecting instantaneous communication, without regard to distance, and consequently without continuous lines as in the electric telegraph, has been brought to light; nay, more—that on the third day of this present month, a question asked at the said 92 Rue Richelieu, received almost immediate reply from the depths of America! and that this was done chiefly by the instrumentality of snails! The inventors or discoverers of the alledged marvel are a M. Benoit, of the Department of the Herault, and a M. Biat of America. After many years' observation and experimentalization, they, it is asserted, have ascertained that certain descriptions of snails possess peculiar properties or sympathies, which cause them to feel, no matter at what distance they may be, the same sensation, or commotion, when acted on in a particular way by galvanic and magnetic influences. Placed in boxes in such a way that, on being touched, they agitate particular letters, the operator has only to make snail A give a kick (sic) and snail A in a corresponding box, which box may be in the backwoods of America or the deserts of Africa, repeats the kick, and so on for every letter of a required word. The snails must of course previously be put in sympathetic communication, and the boxes, with all their apparatus, which is rather complicated, must be alike. The shock which the snail in box 2 feels is said to be caused by an electric or magnetic fluid, carried by the earth with extraordinary rapidity, and in a manner unknown to man; in other words, it is the magnetic telegraph without the connecting wire. All this seems absurd, does it not? but I am describing the thing as it is said to be."

An Eventful Career.

Our obituary this week records the death of an individual (Anna, Duchess of Palata,) the history of whose fortunes would fill no small page in romantic story. She was the daughter of John Peele, a small farmer at Corringham, near Gainsborough, who eked out a somewhat declining livelihood by dealing in horses, &c., having previously been in better circumstances. Being an only daughter, and aware that she possessed no small share of rustic charms, our embryo Dutchess, despising the limited sphere in which she lived, resolved to try her fortune elsewhere. She became a dress-maker in Gainsborough, and resided subsequently in Hull, and it is said as housemaid in a good family in London, where her attractions obtained for her the attentions of a person of rank, to whom she afterward averred she was married; and she from that time occupied a position where her fortunes led her into contact with some of the highest classes. A few years afterward she astonished her former companions by appearing with her carriage and livery servants in the character of chere amie to Mr. Fauntleroy, then a flourishing banker in London. Unfortunately the riches of the banker were of a doubtful character; and some time afterward he was convicted of forgery, and paid the penalty with his life. Affected by the ruin, but not participating in the crime of Fountleroy, our heroine struggled bravely with fate, and generally maintained a fair appearance in society, both in London and in Paris. She shortly reappeared in her native County as Duchess of Palata.

At this time the fortunes of her family had reduced them to be the occupants of a small cottage at Morton, and age rendering her father incapable of active exertion, he filled the humble office of rural Postman. To her honor be it recorded, that she enabled her parents to pass the remainder of their days in comfort. Six or seven years ago she again visited her native place, a widow, his grace the Duke of Palata having paid the debt of nature. Her mother she left at Morton, paid the last duties to her father (somewhat ostentatiously,) and volunteered her assistance to promote the advancement of her female relatives. Again, however, "a change came o'er the spirit of her dream;" and some three or four years ago the public journals announced her marriage with the son of an Irish Clergyman of good family. In this character, accompanied by her neice as femme de chambre, but not by her husband, she once more visited Gainsborough, and the scenes of her youth; after making her mother an allowance, to be paid monthly, (to prevent some avaricious parties from defrauding her of it, as she had too much reason to suspect would be the case,) she again departed for Italy, in good health; but death, which spares neither rank nor character, has closed the last scene of all this strange eventful history. The above are but the broad outlines of her career, although it would be easy to expand them to almost any limit; as related to the writer of this notice, they seemed more like the tales of romance than of veritable narrative. Jenny Lind Leading the Fashion.

The most laughable incident connected with the Queen of Song, that we have yet heard, is said to have taken place at the Irving House, on the first day of her arrival in the city of Gotham. As the gong rang for dinner, there was a perfect stampede among the female boarders of the house, to obtain the earliest possible scrutiny of the various articles of dress, ribbons, comb, or hair-pins, with which the Swedish nightingale might be pleased to adorn herself on this her first appearance before the young and blooming females of America. Judge, then, of the surprise and mortification of every lady present, when the sweet songstress entered the room dressed in the simplest manner possible, and nothing to prevent her flowing locks from falling on her gracefully sloping shoulders, but a few plain hair pins. As she entered the room, and took her seat at the table, there was almost an unanimous exclamation of—"What! no comb on the back of her head? Oh, how unfortunate that I should not have known it, so that I might have left mine in my room, and used a few pins instead."

Now, be it known to our male readers, that the anxiety to ascertain the quality and quantity of Jenny's wearing fixins, was not a fault or peculiarity belonging exclusively to the foregoing ladies; but one that is inherent in the sex, as proven by the fact that on Jenny's retiring to her room, she immediately addressed her dressing maid as follows:—

"Susey, dear, I noticed that all the ladies present at the table to-day, had their hair dressed with great taste and care, and fastened behind with a large comb—and, as I do not wish to appear odd or eccentric while sojourning among so good a people, you will please go out shopping to-day, dear, and obtain me a large comb, with which I can fasten up my hair behind, American fashion."

With a determination to be behind the fashion no longer than could possibly be helped, something over a hundred females were busily engaged during most of the day, in so dressing their hair, that, without the assistance of combs, it should appear a la Jenny Lind.

As Jenny entered the room, the next day, what was her surprise and mortification, on noticing that, instead of every lady having a large comb in her hair, as on the day previous, the hair in every instance was fastened up in true-roll hair-pin style.

The mortification of the female boarders, however, was still greater than that of Jenny—to think that the entire afternoon of the previous day, and some three hours previous to the ringing of the gong on the present occasion, had been devoted to the subject of hair dressing, (the Irving, in fact, having been transformed into a six-storied barber-shop,) and after all, the Nightingale had made her second appearance in a large comb, of precisely the same pattern that they had cast aside as useless and unfashionable, but twenty-four hours previous. Curious Marraige Statistics.

We have before us some curious statistics in relation to Marraige. These have been gathered from various sources. According to the "Register General of England," a lady's chance of getting married is at its maximum, between the age of twenty and twenty-five! Before twenty, a lady has but one-fifth, and 20 to 25, one-third of that maximum chance. After 30 her chance gradually dwindles away, and hence we may infer that there are few ladies who ever go beyond that age. Men it is urged, marry later than women—and yet it appears, according to the figures, that the great majority of marriages are concocted while both parties are under 25. This, however, will not excite surprise with any one who pays the slightest attention to the progress and development of the feelings, the affections, and the impulses. The young are generally sanguine and enthusiastic; and inasmuch as the sexes are apt to associate more intimately and confidentially between the ages of 20 and 25 than at any other period of life—inasmuch as that is emphatically the marriage season, and that men generally determine upon some regular and fixed occupation by that time, the chances of marriage within that period alluded to, are, of course, more numerous. But let even the susceptible pass over 25—let them experience one or two disappointments of the heart—let them grow ambitious of wealth or of power, and matrimony becomes a secondary condition. The heart becomes cold—the disposition cautions—and thus new tastes, new habits, and new associations, are imbibed, and the society of the gentler sex is comparatively neglected. It appears, however, that men retain the power of contracting matrimony to a later age than women; out of 27,483 single persons—we again revert to the statistics—who were married in 1848, there was only one spinster above 50 years of age, whereas there were twelve bachelors!

A widower, it would seem, selects a more steady age than a bachelor, while on the contrary, a widow prefers that her second husband shall be younger than herself. It thus appears that of widows above 50, who contract a second marriage, more than three-fourths are united to men under 50. But it also appears, that as the chances of marriage decrease, the ages of the new partners are found to increase. On a rough calculation, the number of marriages in which widows appears as principals, is about nine per cent. of the whole number, and those in which the bridesgrooms are widowers, about fourteen per cent. of the whole. It might be supposed, therefore, that more widowers contracted alliances with spinsters than bachelors with widows; but, independently of this, it appears that more widows found widowers for partners than bachelors, a fact which illustrates the old apothegm, that, "Tis sympathy makes friends." Many other curious facts are given, to which we may refer hereafter. The subject, we are aware, is always interesting. In France, "the business of matrimony" is, in many cases, systematized, and on very mercenary and calculative principles. Thus, there are "marriage brokers," just the same as we have "stock brokers." Newspapers in different Countries.

The numbers of newspapers and periodicals now published in Russia is 154, of which 64 are published in St. Petersburgh, 12 at Moscow, 5 at Odessa, 32 in the provinces of the Baltic, and 59 in the rest of the Empire. Of these 154 publications, 108 are in the Russian language, 29 in the German, 8 in the French, 5 in the Polish, 3 in the Latin, and 1 in the Italian. Russia contains about 60,000,000 inhabitants, and consequently there are upon an average about three newspapers and periodicals for each million—a very scanty allowance, we should say, of intellectual provender.

In the British Empire proper, with a population of 26,000,000, there are published about 500 newspapers and periodicals, which gives one for every 52,000 of the inhabitants.

In the United States there are probably not less than 1,600 publications of that kind for a population which may be assumed to be 20,000,000 exclusive of all colored persons, who, whether bond or free, are not much addicted to reading of any kind. This gives a newspaper or periodical for every 12,500 inhabitants; and we suppose that on an average there is certainly one for that number of inhabitants, and in some sections of the country a good many more.

STOPPING TRAINS BY ELECTRICITY.—Messrs. H. Freeman and J. Patterson have invented a means of stopping Railroad Trains by Electricity, so as to dispense entirely with the services of Brakemen, and enable the Engineer to stop the train himself by a motion of the hand, and thus obviate the delay, irregularity and misunderstanding, now encountered or hazarded, as well as the disagreeable and dangerous motion now encountered in the process of 'breaking up' a train, part of the cars being held more tightly than others. The plan contemplates the arrangement of a Galvanic Battery on the Locomotive, under the eye and hand of the Engineer, with a rod running thence to each wheel in the train, connected with the different clogs or brakes, and to be connected with the battery by a touch, so as to apply simultaneously and instantly any desirable amount of pressure to every clog. It is computed that a train may be stopped in half the time now required, and with far less jarring, jerking, or wrenching of the cars. Scientific men who have examined the plan have certified that it is entirely feasible. [N. Y. Tribune.

A Will.

The following "last will and testament," says the Philadelphia Ledger, was filed, a day or two since, in the office of the Register of Wills of our County. It is quite a curiosity, and we give it verbatim et literatim et non-punctuatim. The schoolmaster was evidently abroad when it was penned:—

"OCT. 23, 1850—I do bequeath the middle room and garret to my wife and son William—as long as she lives; at her death it goes to William—with a free passage through the lower room each way back or front; a sow and three pigs to my wife and William; the lower room to my daughter Ann—all the wood and coal about the house to my wife and William—my wife is to have privaleg in the seller for wood and coal; two of the fattening hogs to my wife and William; the kitchen part of the house to John—my wife and William is to pay five dollars of ground rent a year, and John and Ann each is to pay five dollars; I wish them all to have equal privaleg in the yard; Thomas is to have five dollars a year for ten years; each of the other hers to pay their equal share of this five dollars; my tite bodied and frock coats and satten west to Thomas, and my watch to Ann; the rest of the hogs to be equally divided between them

How to Prevent Sea-sickness.

"Blessing on the man who will invent a cure for sea-sickness," must certainly be the ejaculation of every one who has traveled at sea and endured its nauseating pains and penalties. In a book upon "Jamaica in 1850," by Mr. John Bigelow, an editor of the N. Y. Evening Post, we notice an account of the method he adopted to prevent sickness, the common terror of inexperienced voyagers. "In the first place," he says, "I was careful never while sitting in the cabin to rest my feet upon the floor, but always to stretch them upon the sofa or chair. In the next place, I always seated myself so that the roll of the ship should pitch me from side to side, and not forward and backward. In the third place, whenever I felt in the least unsettled, I was careful never to fix my attention on any near object, and especially to avoid reading or writing; if necessary, I closed my eyes altogether. Finally, I made it a point to go regularly to the table, and eat moderately of plain food. By the careful observance of these precautions, I was enabled to enjoy my voyage without interruption, and I came to the conclusion that most persons, if in good health when they embark, may avoid sea-sickness by following my example.

PROTECTING TENDER PLANTS AND SHRUBS.—There is one principle which should not be forgotten, whatever be the nature of the covering applied to tender plants, more especially to the woody portions or parts above ground. This is, that the exclusion of moisture is an important object without excluding air. Ligatures are sometimes left on inserted buds for protection, and more usually destroy the buds by retaining water like a sponge. Closely wrapped straw operates in the same way, as well as by excluding air, which is often important. Roots and stems like those of the grape, which will bear a greater degree of moisture, are partial exceptions. Roots, even, are often destroyed when in a too moist soil; and there is no doubt that many tender herbaceous perennials would survive the rigors of our winters, if in earth with a dry bottom, and sheltered from rain. By Howland's patent "Bell Telegraph," a pull of the bell in any room of the house at once rings and raises into view the number of that room, through glass in a case, just by the office or attendant's room, and keeps it there until it has been observed, answered and pulled back from said office. There never can be any mistake as to which bell was rung, and if there should happen to be no one in the office for an hour, the attendant on returning would see at a glance just how many and what bells had been rung. So a boarder taken sick during the night might ring unheard and be unable to ring in the morning; but the first man who should then enter the office, would see that he desired attendance.

Simeon Houghton, Jr., and Wm. R. Harris, of Middlebury, Vt., have invented a most ingenious machine or combination for making Weavers' Harness, which must supersede the old process of making by hand. This machine loops and ties the harness without a particle of human help, and stops the moment any failure takes place or defect is made manifest. It ties a perfectly square knot, and the harness it makes has no twist in the eyes, and is far more uniform and exact than any hand-made can be. Each machine will make over twice as much harness as the best hand-worker can, and one girl will tend three machines. The cost of the machine is about $500.

A bed of silver and copper ore has been discovered about three miles south-east of the village of Brandon, Vt. The ore is incorporated with milk quartz and argillaceous slate. An average specimen, analyzed by W. H. Sheppard, mineralogist, gave 31.13 per centum pure silver, and 17.09 of copper. Messrs. Chapin, Mandalay & Stewart have undertaken to work the mine.

A weaver in Bradford has been for some time employed in weaving in a piece of cloth the whole of the New Testament. He has already completed the four Gospels, and has made some advance in the Acts of the Apostles.

A dispatch dated Baltimore, Nov. 30, says that the burning of the steamboat Columbus, off Point Lookout, was accompanied with the following melancholy loss of life: Capt. Hollingshead, Littleton S. Goodwin, (the mate;) the mate's son; and five of the hands of the boat, all perished in the flames.

The almost white fugitive slaves arrested at New Albany, Ia., of which we recently gave some account, have been ransomed by voluntary contributions of citizens in that vicinity. $575 of the ransom money was raised in New Albany alone.

The Cumberland (Md.) Civilian says that several large purchases of coal lands have been recently made in that neighborhood, by companies working mines in that region.

CHURCH ACTION ON SABBATH DESECRATION.

At a meeting of the First Seventh-day Baptist Church of Alfred, Allegany Co., N. Y., on the 5th day of May, 1841, the following resolutions were adopted:—

1st. Resolved, That the fourth command of the Decalogue imperiously requires that we abstain from all journeying on the seventh day of the week, in ordinary cases, and that we abstain from making cheese, attending to the manufacture of sugar, secular visiting, conversing about our secular concerns, or attending to any ordinary labor, that can with propriety be done on other days; and that we so manage our domestic and other affairs, that at the close of the sixth day of the week we can commence to keep the Sabbath according to the commandment.

2d. Resolved, That we disapprove the reading of political and business papers on the Sabbath; also the reading of novels, and other light literary reading.

On the 7th of Arpil, 1850, it was—

Resolved, That we raise a committee to ascertain the extent of Sabbath desecration, as compared with the resolutions of the church, passed May 5th, 1841, and to present arguments on the subject.

On the 5th of May, the committee reported as follows concerning the extent of Sabbath desecration, which report was adopted by the church on the same day:—

Your committee respectfully report, That so far as they have been able to ascertain, all members of the church engaged in dairying, have conducted that business, more or less, on the Sabbath, since the adoption of the above-mentioned resolutions, and nearly all thus employ a portion of the Sabbath at present, and that the other things specified in the resolutions are practiced to a considerable extent.

The committe also presented the following report in defense of the resolutions of the church, passed in 1841:—

In preparing this report, your committee have not felt at liberty to explore the entire length and breadth of every field which the investigation of the subject might open. They have deemed their duty to extend only to a consideration of the acts specified in the resolutions, with a view to ascertain their conformity or nonconformity with the law of God enjoining the observance of the Sabbath day. In view of the awful sanctions of God's law, of the almost universal repudiation of the fourth commandment, of the zealous watch and persecuting spirit manifested towards those who honor the Lord's Sabbath, and in view of the importance of exemplifying every profession by corresponding action, we have been overwhelmed with a sense of the magnitude of consequences involved in this investigation. If the practices under consideration are violations of God's law, what a fearful load of accountability will accumulate upon this church, if these violations unrebuked shall rise up against her in judgment!—how will they outweigh in their influence all the efforts of those who would enforce the truths we profess! What a stigma on our cause! What an element of weakness and spiritual death!

Cheese-making, hay-making, and sugar-making, may be considered in connection as involving a common principle. We are now to compare these practices with the law of the Sabbath, and endeavor to ascertain whether they agree or disagree.

It will be conceded by all, that these practices require labor, and that to the extent of the practice. But the law of the Sabbath affirms, "In it thou shalt not do any work." Here we have an unqualified prohibition of labor on the Sabbath day. But the letter of this law, unqualified by the spirit and design of it prohibits even labor to the sustenance of life on the Sabbath day. The Pharisaical Jews insisted on a rigid adherence to the letter of the law. This gave occasion for Christ to explain and unfold the true design and spirit of the law. He instructed them that "the Sabbath was made for man;" and, consequently, any construction making it against man, is a perversion of the law. We are then, 1st, to consider whether Christ points out any exceptions to the general rule of prohibition laid down in the law of the Sabbath—and, if so, 2dly, to consider whether the acts specified in the resolutions can be classed with those exceptions.

We observe, that Christ excepts from the rule of prohibition just such acts, and only such as, if not excepted, would make the Sabbath against instead of for man. We will first refer to the incident recorded in Mark 2: 23. The disciples, with the Saviour, were passing through a barley field on the Sabbath day, and, being hungry, plucked some heads of barley and ate the kernel. The ever-watchful Pharisees accused them of Sabbath-breaking, by preparing food to eat; but Christ justified them. Here, then, we find an exception in favor of preparing food. But let us observe, that this example does not even justify the common practice of extensive cookery on the Sabbath day. It justifies only the preparation, in the simplest manner possible, of as much food as will satisfy the demands of appetite.

In Mark 3d we have an account of Christ's healing the withered hand on the Sabbath day. When accused by the Pharisees of breaking the Sabbath law, he replied, "Is it lawful on the Sabbath days to do good, or evil? to save life, or to kill? From this example we learn the lawfulness of mitigating human suffering on the Sabbath day. We cannot too deeply deplore the depravity of those who devote the Sabbath day to the accumulation of property, and quote the Saviour's words on this occasion in defense of their course. The Saviour's example on this occasion does not justify labor on the Sabbath for any property consideration whatever.

We next refer to the healing of the impotent man at the pool of Bethesda, recorded in John 5: 1, 9. The Jews both accused Christ for healing him, and him for carrying his bed on the Sabbath. This act of Christ illustrates the same duty as the last, viz. the mitigation of human suffering on the Sabbath day. The carrying of the bed was designed to drive scepticism from the minds of the hyper-critical Jews concerning the reality of the cure.

The healing of the decrepid woman in the synagogue on the Sabbath (Luke 13th) illustrates the same principle. In Christ's reply to his accusers on that occasion, he extends the principle of mercy from man to animals. "Ye hypocrites, doth not each one of you loose his ox or his ass from the stall on the Sabbath day, and lead him away to watering? and ought not this woman, whom satan hath bound these eighteen years, to be loosed from this bond on the Sabbath day?" We understand Christ to chide the ruler for his inconsistency, as if he had said, "You relieve the wants of your cattle, and save them from suffering, on the Sabbath, and this is well; but why do you object that I should relieve the sufferings of this woman?"

This same exception is again admitted by Christ in healing the dropsied man in the house of the Pharisee (Luke 14: 2—5.) In this instance, Christ justifies his act by comparing it with the acts of his accusers in helping animals out of distress on the Sabbath day. Both his act and theirs were lawful on the ground of mercy alone.

We have now examined all the exceptions to the rule of prohibition, as developed by Christ. In imitation of Christ, then, we may, in the shortest manner possible, labor to satisfy the common, natural demands of men and animals, and to mitigate their sufferings. Beyond this we most firmly believe that the Bible affords no warrant for labor on the Sabbath day, and that all labor, aside from this, is forbidden by the spirit and letter of the law.

Let us now consider whether the acts under consideration can be classed with those recognized by Christ as lawful. If they can be reduced to simple deeds of mercy, they are no violation of the law. But if they can not, then they most surely are violations of the law.

We can conceive of no emergency in which cheese-making can be reduced to this form. It is not necessary to make a cheese on the Sabbath to eat on that day; for enough can be made during the week for that purpose. But if cheese previously made, and all other food save the milk of the cow, should fail, on the Sabbath, then surely that would not be a more simple diet than the unground and unbaked barley eaten by Christ and his disciples on the Sabbath day. The same is true of hay-making and sugar-making. They cannot be classed with deeds of mercy to man or beast. So far from being deeds of mercy, they are most unmerciful, for they rob man and beast of that rest which the Sabbath was appointed to give. The rest of the Sabbath is indispensable to man's greatest good, else God never would have appointed it. Whoever, then, labors for these ends on the Sabbath, insults God by refusing his proffered blessing of rest, and inflicts an actual injury upon himself, and thus commits a double sin. It will not better the case to affirm that it requires as much labor to make the milk into butter as into cheese, for if butter-making be not a direct act of mercy, God's law forbids it on the Sabbath day. It is in vain for the dairyman to plead the preservation of a few pails of milk as an offset against the violation of God's law. For what does he wish to preserve it? To assuage some suffering, or to meet some immediate necessity of nature? Nay, verily—but to add to the income of the dairy. This question of saving is only a veil to hide the more palpable one of accumulating. Who would care to save the milk were it not to add to his income in the end? This whole question is one of accumulation by labor on God's holy Sabbath day. There can be no necessity in the case, except the necessity to have the income at the end of the year, plus the value of the products of Sabbath labor. What a repudiation of the doctrines of Him who taught, that unless we are willing to leave all and follow Him, we can be none of his! The Bible teaches no other doctrine on this point than an unconditional surrender of every earthly consideration rather than violate a single precept of God's law. What will infidels think of a religion which puts a few cheeses in the scale against God's law, and they sink the balance? What will poor heathen, who cheerfully give their lives in supposed obedience to false gods, think of Christians who will disobey the true God to save a few buckets of sap? How will the spirits of the blessed apostles, who endured so much to maintain the sanctity of God's law, weep over us! How will the shades of fallen martyrs chide us, who cheerfully gave—not a few cheeses—not a few dollars —but their entire property, consecrated by their hearts' blood, upon the altar of God, rather than rob him of a single due to sacrifice to Mammon! What will these ungodly gains avail us in judgment? We have saved a few cheeses, a little sugar, and a little hay, but will God accept such commodities in return for what we have subtracted from his dues to obtain them? Though we pierce the heavens with a pyramid of gold, will the King of heaven accept it in return for a single hour of Sabbath desecration? If we voluntarily engage in business which we know will demand a violation of God's law, or a loss of profit, we then come to a deliberate choice between God's law and worldly profit. There is no necessity in the case. No man, in the first place, is necessitated to be a dairyman; and, being one, he is not necessitated to break the Sabbath. If the business involves such a necessity, then he who chooses that business, chooses to be a sinner, deliberately and knowingly.

The practice of traveling is not less inconsistent with the duties of the Sabbath than those already commented upon. Except on errands of mercy, or to attend divine worship, we find no warrant in the Bible for traveling on the Sabbath. It is a manifest misappropriation of that time sacred to spiritual things. It not only robs man and beast of that rest made necessary by the constitution of nature, and obligatory by the laws of God, but it robs God of that solemn service to which such rest is so conducive. The saving of time and money cannot for a moment be admitted in palliation of this act, without admitting the right to rob from God to give to Mammon. If there be an actual necessity in the case, then we affirm that a necessary act incurs no blame. But be it understood, that the saving of time or money constitutes no actual necessity in the case. He who is not willing to make this small sacrifice for the sake of exhibiting God's law inviolate to the world, will never wear a martyr's crown. Who can tell how much the Sabbath of the Lord has suffered by the example of those professing to observe it? They thus throw themselves into public gaze, and give the deed the widest influence. If such desecration were in retirement, none but God might see it; but the greatest possible notoriety is given to the act of Sabbath traveling. What good might not be done if our traveling brethren would rest where, in the providence of God, the Sabbath overtakes them, and thus become living examples of piety, and efficient missionaries of truth. A single Sabbath thus devoted to God might sow the seeds of truth, soon to spring up and bring forth a plentiful harvest, where darkness otherwise might have brooded forever. There is a potency in silent example, which loud-sounding words can never attain, nor mental power resist. This silent working principle, lying far down in the foundations of human society, governs the world with a sway more resistless than the mightiest conqueror that ever swam to empire through seas of blood. A single individual, more in love with duty than money, might, by observing one Sabbath among strangers, and leaving a few silent messengers behind to point to a "thus saith the Lord" for his practice, exert a more powerful influence than the verbal preaching of a lifetime. And yet we often hear the plea, "Can't afford it." Well, it may be that God cannot afford to bless them who cannot afford to serve him. Such an example of Sabbath violation may plant the seeds of indifference in the minds of children, which will produce a most luxuriant crop of infidelity. Eternity only can develop the consequences of desecrating God's holy time.

Sabbath [illegible]ble with the design of the Sabbath. The Sabbath has social duties, but we have yet to learn that visiting for ordinary enjoyment and conversation, finds any sanction in the word of God. This practice cannot fail to induce looseness and indifference to the duties of the Sabbath, which, if not resisted, must eventuate in its overthrow. Aside from the public worship of God, the devout Christian finds none too much time on the Sabbath to commune with his own soul, with his God, his Bible and his family, in searching the ways of truth and duty. Who then has a right to rob him of time thus employed, by unwished for visits? But has not the visitor these same duties to perform at home? Then why rob himself, and his neighbor too, of the rich blessings of a Sabbath day spent for the Lord? This practice is tenfold more pernicious in its effects, from its intimate connection with the impressible minds of children. It thus becomes self-perpetuating; and long after the parent sleeps in dust, some Sabbath-breaker may throw the sanctity of parental example around his deeds. Who can estimate the weight of responsibility of parents, and the duty to hallow, by a consistent example, the laws of God in the hearts of those who through all time will reflect their moral image?

The reading of political papers on the Sabbath, as it intrudes upon the more appropriate employment of sacred time, lacks a warrant in the Bible. The matter usually contained in those papers is little calculated to foster a devotional spirit. The stirring scenes of the political world, and the disorder incident to forensic strife, form very innutritious food for a soul humble before God in Sabbath day devotion. It is true that the Bible teaches politics; and were the politics of the country the politics of the Bible, they might form appropriate subjects for Sabbath day meditation. But the politics of the nation repudiate the politics of the Bible, and are as adverse to Sabbath day duties as any thing else which repudiates the Bible. We do most confidently hope, that the day may come when the politics of the nation may be so impregnated with those of the Bible, that the greatest politician may be the best Christian. If Christians must read politics on the Sabbath, let them be content to read those of the Bible, from its own pages. We believe the science of human government to be a part of God's moral government, and, therefore, not unworthy the Sabbath day, if studied uncontaminated in Heaven's great law book. But we think most of our political newspapers are forged editions, and, therefore, unworthy the Sabbath day, or any other day.

The practice of novel reading on the Sabbath, or any day, in the opinion of your committee, is condemned by the plainest precepts of the Bible, by universal experience, and human consciousness. The yells of the maniac from his grated cell, the despairing wail of fallen virtue, the disconsolate tears of betrayed affection, and the bitter lament of ruined souls, all cry out against it. It develops in undue proportion the most dangerous passions of the human soul, and destroys its native symmetry. No language can portray the fearful wreck of mind which follows in the wake of the destroyer. It is in our midst, and victims already stand on the verge of infamy, drawn there by the insinuations of this foe of God and virtue.

D. E. MAXSON,
AMOS BURDICK,
WM. S. BURDICK,
B. W. MILLARD, } Acting Committee.

On the 1st of December, 1850, at the usual meeting of the church, by previous appointment, the foregoing report came up for final disposition, having been previously discussed. It had been objected, that it tended to injure the business of a large and very respectable portion of the church—that it was very difficult to draw the line between Sabbath observance and Sabbath desecration—and it had been urged, that cheese-making, &c., were deeds of mercy, such as Christ in his explanations of the law justified. The vote being called, it was resolved to reject the report, and rescind the resolutions adopted nine years ago. The resolution to rescind those resolutions was as follows:—

Whereas, we are bound by the constitution of the church to take the word of God for the rule of our lives, therefore, Resolved, That we recede from the resolutions on our record setting limitations to the law of the Sabbath, and conform our lives to the law of God and to our solemn covenant obligations.

In defense of this resolution, it was urged, that church resolutions have a pernicious tendency, and that no church might expect to prosper which allows itself to pass resolutions on the various topics set forth in the Bible—that each member should be the judge as to what specific course of conduct he ought to pursue.

It was then moved to rescind resolutions on record concerning Secret Societies, Temperance, and Slavery, which motion was dropped for further consideration. There were a few brethren who protested earnestly against these proceedings, and defended the report. This movement of the church was all in good faith, and we trust no discord will grow out of it.

INTERIOR OF WEST AFRICA.

Accounts of a very interesting character have lately been received from West Africa. Rev. George Thompson has penetrated into the interior about 200 miles (300 following the course of the river,) where the people had never before seen a white man.

Mr. Thompson was sent out to West Africa about two years ago by the American Missionary Association, as successor to Rev. William Raymond, who accompanied the Amistad Africans to their native country. He was stationed at a place called Kaw Mendi, on the Little Room River, about 100 miles south of Sierra Leone, and 50 miles from the coast, this being as near the Mendi Country as the missionaries could reach, owing to the wars then prevailing in that region.

His efforts to instruct and benefit the people were greatly hindered by the war which was raging among the different tribes in the Sherbus Country, and which extended far back into the Mendi Country. This war had prevailed several years. The consequence was, that many towns were quite depopulated, the cultivation of the soil was almost abandoned, the people suffered sorely from famine, and multitudes were carried to the coast, and sold into slavery. The women and children were often obliged to go out in search of berries and fruits, to keep themselves from starving.

Things went on in this way for more than a year after Mr. Thompson's arrival, the war raging all around the settlement. Meanwhile, he had been gaining the confidence of the chiefs and people on both sides. Mr. Raymond, his predecessor, who labored there some five or six years, had done much to promote a friendly feeling among the natives. This has always been made a prominent object with the mission, because these wars are the great means of perpetuating the traffic in slaves. In fact, to suppress war in Africa, is to suppress the slave trade. During the whole time, the mission premises had been considered as neutral ground; it being well understood that the missionary there was a man of peace, and preached a gospel which forbade war, and enjoined on all men to love one another.

At length, Mr. Thompson assembled a large number of the chiefs and principal men at the mission-house, and spent several days in hearing their causes of complaint, and endeavoring to reconcile them to one another. They were all heartily tired of the war, but neither party was inclined to make much concession. However, by dint of arguments, persuasions and presents, he succeeded in bringing them round, so that they concluded on terms of peace. This was a most joyful event to a people who had endured all the horror of savage warfare for nearly nine years.

But as there were other tribes at a distance, who were concerned in this war, Mr. Thompson found that to secure the advantage already gained, and insure a general and permanent peace, it would be necessary for him to visit them.

On the 13th of March last, he started on this benevolent errand, taking with him Thomas Bunyan, his interpreter, (a native Mendian,) and five others. They made their way in a canoe up the Little Boom; after following it for some time they entered a fine large river, as wide as the Ohio or Mississippi. This noble stream is called, in distinction from its tributary, the Big Boom. They followed it up as far as Tissana, a large walled town at the head of navigation. Here he was met by Braw, the principal chief on that side of the war. This chief had heard of the Christian religion through Bunyan, and some years before had visited the Mission at Kaw Mendi; he had long desired to have a teacher come to this country, and was overjoyed when he heard of Mr. Thompson's arrival. The account of their first interview is so interesting that we must give it in his own words. Mr. T. says:

"On the wide sand beach he came down to meet me, and as he approached I could hear him exclaim, 'O Ga-waw! O Fe-a-ra Ga-waw! Fe-a-ra Ga-waw! Fe-a-ra, fe-a-ra, fe-a-ra Ga-waw!' which is, 'O thank God! thank God! thank, thank, thank God!' He repeated it many times as we met, and embraced me with all the the warmth of a long-absent father. The scene was touching in my heart; the town was full of joy at my arrival; every face beamed with gladness, and from all the country round where the tidings flew as on the wings of the wind, they flocked to Tissana, to get a view of the white man. For days I could do little else but content myself to be put up to public gaze—shake hands from morning till night, and hear their exclamations of wonder and their thanks for my coming to their country to teach them."

After a few days spent at Tissana, during which, at Braw's request, Mr. Thompson entered into an agreement to establish a Mission there, he started, accompanied by the friendly chief, to visit the tribes on the other side. He passed through great dangers and hardships, from which his health suffered severely; but after spending about two months among them, he had the happiness of seeing his labors crowned with success. Peace was established. Great were the rejoicings among chiefs and people. Under date of April 8, he says:—

"From day to day I witness thrilling scenes; warriors meeting and falling on each other's necks—chiefs, who have for years been enemies, now shaking hands and embracing with the affection of long-separated friends; sisters, wives, daughters, long captive, falling into each other's arms with great emotion—sinking on the ground—weeping long and loud before they can be quieted. Now a chief's daughter is seen running to embrace her father's feet, refusing to be torn from her hold; then a wife returns to embrace her husband and children, while the whole town join in the cry of rejoicing. To witness such scenes day after day, who could help shouting? I will rejoice with them and praise the Lord."

They told Mr. Thompson that no one but a white man could have brought about this peace, and said they had long been praying that God would send a white man to stop the war. Mr. T. says:—

"About one o'clock we met in the Barne (Palaver House) again, and two such enthusiastic, spirited, good-natured peace-Mouth' made a long speech, and thanked me very much—could not thank me enough; spoke again of the feeling which had long existed among them; that no colored man could stop the war; that unless a white man should come to hold it, it could never be stopped; but God had sent a white man, and they could not deny his word; and added: 'We do not know how to express our joy and thankfulness at your coming.'"

While thus engaged, Mr. Thompson lost no opportunity of unfolding to them the great truths of the Gospel. He found everywhere a readiness to listen. Their hearts seemed in a wonderful manner prepared to receive the truth; they welcomed him as the Ambassador of Heaven. When he left, they begged earnestly that he would send them teachers.

Here, then, is an inviting field all ready for the harvest. Mr. Thompson writes:—

"They welcome the Gospel as gladness—as the thing they need. They call for schools and teachers. Shall they have them? The impression is strong in favor of white men coming among them. Missionaries and teachers would be received with open arms and shouts of joy. There is an undoubted call of God to plant the Gospel in this country. Shall it be heeded?

"Young men and women, what say you? Ministers, doctors, mechanics, what is your answer? Come not to make money—get a name, see the world—but to do good—to teach and exemplify the Gospel. Beside ministers and teachers, we want carpenters, weavers, cotton-growers, sugar-makers, &c., who will do all these things only for God and souls."

In the eagerness of this interesting people for religious instruction, we are forcibly reminded of the promise: "Ethiopia shall soon stretch out her hands to God." They do indeed seem to be stretching out their hands to God, and he is saying: "Whom shall we send, and who will go for us?"

PROTESTANTISM IN ENGLAND.

Let no man say that Protestantism has failed there. No! no! the people of Great Britain, next to the citizens of our great Republic, are the most happy people on the face of the earth. The voice of that indignant nation, shouting in tones of mighty remonstrance against the stealthy and arrogant advances of the Papacy, is even now sounding over the broad Atlantic, and waking an echo in Protestant America! But why has not Protestantism gained even a stronger position in Britain? It obtained immense resources in the forfeited revenues of the Papacy! Aye, and it took the curse that was upon that treasure also. God hates robbery for a burnt-offering. How had it been amassed? By the most unblushing frauds! By extortion the most heartless! By wringing from the hard hand of the honest laborer, his slender earnings, in exchange for holy beads and Agnus Deis and holy water, and all the apparatus of monkish superstition!

The Church of England, with her noble array of martyr confessors—with her history embalming the fragrant memories of a thousand master spirits of theological science—with her strong "articles" of Protestant faith—has nothing to fear from the malice of open foes, or from the treachery of false children, who, like vipers, sting the bosom that has fostered them! She is Protestant to her heart's core, and her past history is the guerdon, that, by God's grace, she will be Protestant to the end of time. Let her be agitated! The agitation will only bring the scum to the surface, and if it overflows, the sooner the refuse is cast into the cauldron of the Papacy, and left to bubble there, the better for her purity and her strength. But I wish to the Church of England what I desire for the Presbyterian Church of Scotland, and for the Evangelical Church of Prussia, for the Lutheran Church of Sweden, and for every branch of the Reformed Church throughout Europe, to all alike a speedy divorce from all unnatural and unscriptural alliance with the State! This has been a canker-worm at the root of them all. The time has been when such a repudiation would have been neither prudent nor desirable, but it has gone by. God in his providence has permitted it, that his Church—the Protestant Church—in all her branches, might draw profit from the lessons of experience, and learn that the name of the God of Jacob is her best defense! This entanglement is like the weight of Saul's armor upon the limbs of David. She can walk better, and work better, and fight better, without it. The simple sling of gospel truth, in the heaven-directed hand of the shepherd boy—the type of the Christian pastor—and the smooth stones, gathered from the bed of the river of life, are all the offensive weapons that we need to send the missive of death crashing through the brazen helmet into the very brain of Antichrist. There is a moral union of Church and State resulting from the predominance of the popular or national religion—framing the laws, moulding the institutions of every country, and diffusing its influence like leaven through all the ramifications of society; and this is the only legitimate union—this is all that Protestantism requires, and it should seek no other. BEST ROOMS.

Among all the follies prevalent in the middle classes, that of sacrificing family comfort and convenience to the absurd desire of having a best room is one of the most ridiculous. Let it not be inferred that we consider good furniture, elegant curtains, and handsome carpets, as superfluous luxuries for people in plebian state—far from it. Consistent taste and prudent display are to be as much admired in the house of a commoner as in the saloons of a nobleman; but when a room is set apart in a small domicil as the mere receptacle of company, and all in that ostentatious pretensions; when chairs are cased in Holland jackets, and the carpet puts on its pinafore of the same material for months together; when the apartment is literally shut up,—indicating that family comfort lies dead within it,—then may the best room be condemned as worse than useless.

For our own part, we think there is something perfectly terrifying in being asked into a stately and fine drawing-room—the polished bars shining with unnatural brightness—the fire-irons arranged in stiff angles, evidently never appropriated to their purpose—the table most geometrically studded with glossy unread volumes of rubbish, and the besilked and betasseled sofas looking as if they were intended for anything but sitting on. We give an involuntary shudder as we are left to gaze on costly chimney ornaments and japanned screens, while the lady of the house is, most probably, making a rush to execute the metamorphose of dress and cap. We would much rather have been introduced to the common parlor, where we should have beheld some signs of vitality, and thawed ourselves into good-humored cheerfulness; but then and there we might have beheld a basket of stockings and socks undergoing the process of repair, the young ones might have been lugging the chairs about, and left a tailless horse and a wheelless cart in the foreground; we might have formed suspicions that bloaters had been among the matin condiments; and oh, most dire of all! we might have found the mistress in a somewhat rumpled morning wrapper, and a "fright of a cap." Still we should greatly prefer the risks of breaking our neck over Noah's ark, sitting down on a heap of undarned hose, and encountering a fifth rate head-gear, to the petrifying, spirit-damping fifteen minutes we are sentenced to sit in a "best room."

The children, if there happen to be such humanizing things in the establishment, look on the walls with a sort of religious awe. They never "play" in the "best room," they never dream of clutching at the splendid bell-rope; they never have the most remote idea of making Lord Mayors' coaches of the embroidered foot-stools, and never think of playing at "Bo-peep" behind the richly fringed damask drapery; they never dare to speculate as to whether, with a stout pin, they could pick out the eyes of the queer little man on the Indian card box; mirth and mischief are thoroughly mesmerized, and the little darlings sit or stand as though their life-tide had been suddenly manufactured into the "best starch."

And let us confess, that we experience no inconsiderable sense of misery ourselves in such a situation. It may be that a trace of gipsy blood is in our veins, or that some natural disqualification for "gentility," equally ignoble, marks us, but we are certainly never quite comfortable in a room that is only occupied on "grand occasions." [Eliza Cook.

We do not know of a finer rule for social, moral, or political action, than the following by Wm. Leggett, formerly of New York, and one of the ablest political writers this country ever possessed:—"Convince me that a principle is right in the abstract, and I will reduce it to practice if I can."

"DESTINY OF THE WICKED."

Farther Reply to "H. C. H."

It may be, that in our strictures upon the doctrine of the annihilation of the wicked, we were not sufficiently clear. We shall try to make ourselves understood this time.

We quoted a number of terms, which were used in Scripture to express the punishment of the wicked; such as, perish—utterly perish—destroy—destroyed—perdition—consumed—destruction—death, &c. These terms are used in reference to what is called "the second death," which is admitted to be the last token of God's indignation against his enemies. We then showed, by a number of quotations, that these terms were quite as frequently employed in reference to the first death as they were to the second; and we argued, that if the use of such terms in reference to the second death proved the doctrine of annihilation, the application of them to the first death also proved annihilation. That is, the application of them to the first death proves the annihilation—the entire extinction of being—of those concerning whom there is an absolute certainty that they yet live. For, let it be observed, that these terms are applied to the death—we mean now the death of the body—not only of the wicked, but also of the righteous. (See Luke 13: 33, 1 Sam. 27: 1, Mic. 7: 2, Isa. 57: 1, Luke 11: 51, Eccl. 7: 15, Acts 9: 21.) But that the righteous live in the intermediate or separate state, we showed, most conclusively, last week. Nay, if the parable of the rich man and Lazarus is to be received as canonical scripture, it was quite as conclusively proved, that the wicked live in that state also.

As far, then, as the argument for annihilation rests upon the use of these terms—perish, destroy, death, perdition, &c.—nothing whatever is proved. The argument of "H. C. H.," that as the use of these terms in reference to the first death proves utter extermination from this world, so the use of them in reference to the second death proves the utter extermination of the wicked from the world to come, requires a little revision, unless by "the world to come" he means the heavenly state. Let it be granted, that "these terms have the same force when applied to the second death that they have when applied to the first," and the argument, properly stated, will read thus:—As men live after the first death has utterly exterminated them from this world, so the wicked live after the second death has utterly exterminated them from the heavenly world. That their second death consists in, or will ever result in, any thing more than banishment from the gracious presence of God, with such super-added tokens of his wrath as may be necessary to vindicate the righteousness of his law, lacks proof. (See Matt. 25: 41 and 7: 23, Luke 13: 27, Ps. 5: 5.)

"In arguing against the sleep of the dead," we did not, it is true, appeal directly to the Scriptures. We thought it sufficient to show, that the same terms which were relied upon to prove annihilation by the second death, proved also annihilation by the first death. This, in our opinion, was proving a great deal too much; and we did not doubt, that the most of our readers would think so. We did not doubt, that they would at once recall to mind such passages as, "Absent from the body, and present with the Lord," "Fear not them which kill the body, but are not able to kill the soul," "To-day thou shalt be with me in Paradise," &c., and feel satisfied, that the departed still lived in a state of consciousness between death and the resurrection, whatever might become of them afterwards. Then, by way of clinching the proof, we added a moral argument for the soul's natural immortality. We did this, not because we supposed such arguments to possess more cogency than direct Scripture testimony, but in order, if possible, to correct that obliquity of mental vision which misconstrues the Scriptures, perverts them, and wrests them from their true meaning, in order to serve some preconceived theory. If we are not mistaken, that argument has been felt to be unanswerable. Certain it is, that if the soul suffers annihilation at death, he who is brought into being by the resurrection is not the same person who died. The resurrection, in that case, is not a resurrection; it is the creation of a new conscious being, and not the same conscious being who once deserved punishment, or had a title to reward.

But some seem to imagine quite a difference between the annihilation of the soul and its sinking into a state of unconsciousness, or profound sleep; and "H. C. H." appears to be among the number. Unless he is much mistaken, he has quite turned the tables against us, and given us the alternative of recanting our words, or denying the resurrection of the dead. We had argued, that if the soul sank into a state of unconsciousness, it possessed no natural capacity to be punished or rewarded, unless there was some fixed law of its nature, by which it would awake to consciousness again at the last day. We contend, that there is no such fixed law—that if the soul, after once sinking into unconsciousness, should be aroused to consciousness again, it will be brought about by supernatural or miraculous agency. Therefore, if it were true that the soul did sink into a state of unconsciousness at death, it could not be punished at all in the future life, till miraculous agency had first intervened. If this is not fair argument, we know not what is. But our correspondent asks, "Does this kind of reasoning weigh more against the unconscious state of the dead in the intermediate state, than it does against the resurrection?" To this question we shall attempt a reply.

We maintain, that God has so constituted the nature of the soul, that it is capable of the highest degree of virtue or of the most odious vices. It possesses also a natural capacity of being rewarded for its virtues or punished for its vices. The happiness, which it enjoys in a course of virtue, is the reward; the misery, which it feels in a life of sin, or the remorse which it afterwards feels, is the punishment. Now, if the soul sinks into unconsciousness at death, it can receive no recompense for its actions in this life, till it is again roused to consciousness. If it awakes to consciousness, according to some fixed law of its nature, then, we may say, it possesses a natural capacity of being recompensed. But if it does not awake, till supernatural power has awakened it, with what propriety can it be said to possess a natural capacity of being recompensed according to its deeds? It seems to us very unreasonable to suppose, that God has so constituted the nature of man, that though he is capable of the most exalted virtue or the most odious vices, the rewards of virtue and the recompenses of vice cannot be certainly and effectually meted out to him; or, which is the same thing, that they cannot be certainly and effectually meted out without the intervention of a miracle. But, upon the supposition of the soul's natural immortality, this difficulty entirely disappears.

Suppose that a man wantonly kills his neighbor, and then, to evade the penalty of the civil law, kills himself. Here, according to the doctrine upon which we are animadverting, a guilty wretch at once places himself in such a condition that the recompense of his crime cannot be visited upon him till a miracle has been wrought. Does any man, in his sober senses, believe, that the wise Creator and righteous Governor of the world has no other way of showing that "the way of transgressors is hard," except by the performance of miracles?

In regard to the resurrection, the case is altogether different. That which is raised is the body—simple matter. The body possesses no natural capacity of being punished for vice, or rewarded for virtue, because, in itself, it is capable of neither virtue nor vice. Moral character cannot be predicated of mere matter. The body and its members may be instruments of righteousness, but they are never the accountable agents. The body is raised up at the last day, not that it may be punished for its sins, but that the soul may be punished in the body. If the body could, in itself, be guilty of sin or capable of virtue, we should say that it ought to possess a natural capacity of being recompensed for the same. We should say, that it ought to possess a capacity of being punished, or rewarded, without the intervention of a miracle. We should say, that there ought to be some fixed law by which it would awake to life again at the last day; or that, immediately upon putting off this outward tabernacle, the soul should, according to some natural law, become invested with its resurrection body. But as long as we believe, that there is an essential difference between body and soul—matter and spirit—we are under no necessity of reasoning in this way.

But, after all, the difference between the sinking of the soul into a state of unconsciousness, and its utter annihilation, is, at least, questionable. In the vast range of creation, there are but two substances of which we have any knowledge—matter and spirit. The essential properties of the one are extension and impenetrability; of the other, perception and consciousness. We know nothing of the essence of either, except by these properties; and we can no more conceive of a spirit, or soul, without consciousness, than we can conceive of matter without extension.

If our premises and conclusions are correct, it is the soul's natural immortality which lays the foundation of rewards and punishments, in different degrees, in the future life. In the doctrine of annihilation at death, or of the soul's unconsciousness between death and the resurrection, we can see nothing but absurdity. But will the wicked, after the resurrection, and after suffering a long time in torment, be annihilated? This brings us directly to our correspondent's question, Will the punishment of the wicked INCLUDE annihilation? He supposes, that "the punishment of the wicked includes an entire extinction of being, and that God has willed that this extinction of being shall be the RESULT of the punishment previously inflicted, and not that the punishment shall be made up of annihilation."

All we have to say on this point, at present, is, that no such doctrine is revealed in the Scriptures. The terms employed to express the final state of the wicked convey no such idea. Corruption, death, perish, consume, &c., as we have already seen, are employed in reference to corporeal death, notwithstanding the soul survives, "absent from the body and present with the Lord," or "in hell, being in torments." Why these terms should be supposed to teach the doctrine of annihilation, after the resurrection, we do not comprehend. And when it is considered, that other language is used which implies a state of suffering, while annihilation implies the destruction of all feeling, the doctrine appears still more improbable. The wicked are said to depart into everlasting fire. They shall weep, and wail, and gnash their teeth. They shall dwell with—not be annihilated by—everlasting burnings. After they themselves shall have been thrust out, they shall see Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, and all the prophets, in the kingdom of God. They shall stand without, crying, Lord, Lord, open to us; to whom the master shall say, I know you not, depart from me. If this state of consciousness and suffering is finally to terminate, we ask for the proof. Of the unfaithful servant it is said, His Lord "shall cut him in sunder, and appoint him his portion with hypocrites; there shall be wailing and gnashing of teeth." To cut a man asunder, as determinately expresses annihilation, as the words death, perdition, &c. This, however, the Scripture supposes to be consistent with a state of misery, expressed by wailing and gnashing of teeth.

We could easily extend our remarks on this point, but we fear that our readers will tire of the subject. May the God of truth accept of what we have written, or teach us our error.

THE AMERICAN BIBLE UNION.

In reference to an article in the 24th number of the Recorder, calling attention to the position of the American Bible Union on the Slavery question, the Editor of the American Baptist says:—

> "While we cordially approve the principle upon which the Union is based, that of giving the Bible to the world in the most accurate versions that can be procured, we can have no fellowship with its practice so long as it seeks or is willing to receive, from those who make merchandize of the bodies and souls of men, the avails of their iniquity."

In the 25th number of the Recorder is an article from "J. C.," and also one from "An Old Disciple," justifying the practice of the Union in regard to receiving funds from any body, without any scruples of conscience. To "J. C.'s" article, Editor Walker has the following reply:—

> [We copy the article] with pleasure; but not without expressing our abhorrence and utter loathing of the position it assumes in regard to the acceptance, for religious purposes, of the avails of slavery,—and not without exposing, as we best may, the unsoundness of the reasoning employed in defense of that position. It is here affirmed, that the American Bible Union recognizes the right of every man to contribute his quota to the attainment of the object it has in view—the full and faithful translation of the Scriptures; and that, to deny to any man the right of contribution, would be to deny his right to a pure Bible. And this statement is made with direct reference to men whose means of contribution have been gained, in whole or in part, from the labor or the sale of slaves. The position assumed, is, that men who possess no other property than such as has been so acquired, have a right, quota," or "give what they can," to help on the work of the Union; and that the Union, in recognizing that right, concedes only that which it were usurpation to deny.
>
> Now, one objection to the acceptance of money contributed by such men, is, that it is not theirs to contribute. If it were earned by the unpaid toil of the slave, he is its rightful owner. It is withheld from him by force; and the American Bible Union, in accepting it, becomes a participant in the robbery. If gained by the sale of the slave, it was obtained on the false pretence of conveying to another a title which the pretender himself did not, and could not, rightfully hold; and the American Bible Union, in accepting it, becomes a party to the fraud. In either case, the contributer has no right to give it, because it belongs to another, or others; and for the same reason, neither the Bible Union, nor any other religious society, has a right to receive it.
>
> But there is another reason. In either case, it is procured by the violent enslavement of one whom God had given an inalienable right to be free; and neither the Bible Union nor any other religious society can receive it, without sharing the guilt of that violent enslavement, to which it thus gives the sanction of its assent. This is in accordance with a principle that holds universally. The acceptance, for religious purposes, of the avails of any act, practice, or business, must be taken as evidence that, in the view of the accepter, such act, practice, or business, is not inconsistent with the claims of religion.
>
> The object of the writer, in taking the ground that no proffered contribution for religious purposes, by whatever means acquired, can rightfully be rejected, is to justify the Bible Union in receiving money acquired by the labor or the sale of slaves; but the principle is a broad one, and will cover other cases. If his ground be tenable, then, not only must the avails of slave labor and of the slave traffic be received, but the avails of assassination and of prostitution must also be welcome! Indeed, there is little difference, slavery itself being essentially both a licentious and a murderous system. Start not, friends of the Bible Union. Repress the involuntary loathing with which you contemplate the sanction it must give, according to this principle, to all that is impious and vile. Listen to one who gravely vindicates that sanction. "Put these questions to yourselves: Do I desire this blessing (a pure Bible) for myself and others? Then ought not I to contribute to obtain it? Have I a right to exclude any one from the blessing, and to say If you pay your share I will not pay mine?" The meaning of this, if it has any meaning that is pertinent to the matter in question is, that by whatever execrable means money offered to the Bible Union may have been obtained, its acceptance by that body furnishes to individuals no valid reason for withholding from it their co-operation. Whether accruing from coerced and unpaid toil, or from the sale of the bones and sinews of the toiler—whether seized as a spoil by violence, or received as the reward of infamy—no man, it is here assumed, has for that reason a right to withhold his support from the body that receives it, and so sanction the wrongs by which it was acquired.
>
> To this we reply—Jehovah hates robbery for burnt offering. He hates and abhors the oblation which is the fruit of wrong doing. For a professedly religious body to accept, in His name, and for His service, that which He has made known his purpose to reject, is impious; and the man who gives to such a body his fellowship and coöperation, it seems to us, must share in the guilt of that impiety."

To the above I would add, that Seventh-day Baptists have not yet been reduced to the absolute necessity of coöperating with the American Bible Union, in order to give the Bible in its purity to the world, and thus discharge their duty in this respect. That Society is willing to coöperate with the South in its work of benevolence, just as some churches are willing to and do coöperate and commune with liquor-drinkers and liquor-sellers in sending the gospel to the heathen. We contend that this WAY of doing the work which God has put into our hands is wrong. As well might we rob Peter to pay Paul, as to take the price of God's suffering poor to help forward the Gospel and do our duty to the heathen. "I will have mercy and not sacrifice," is the language of Christ. "I hate robbery for burnt offering." The cause of God has never been so straitened as to justify resorting to unhallowed gains for its promotion. Would to God that the ministers and churches of the demonination might speak out and act on this subject as Bible truth, mercy, liberty, and their own dear-bought but blessed experience demand.

The author of the article signed "An Old Disciple," is sorry to see my article in the Recorder, because he believes that it "is calculated to mislead the unwary, and to injure one of the most praiseworthy objects which has been attempted by the people of God in any previous age." Yet he does not attempt to refute the charge I have brought against that Society. No—a worldly conservatism forbids it. Men in these days throw so much sanctity around a society composed of certain D.D.s, wise bretbren, &c., that they are always sorry to see or hear any thing against their favorite scheme. As yet I have never known this kind of sorrow to work repentance. WM. M. JONES.

DEATH OF ALFRED STILLMAN.

The announcement of the death of Mr. ALFRED STILLMAN, of New York, by the recent explosion at New Orleans, has brought sadness to a large circle of friends, and whelmed in affliction an interesting and doting family. He had been absent from home since the 11th of October last, and having accomplished the object of his visit to the South, was on the eve of returning. From a letter received by his family on the day of the explosion, expressive of his satisfaction in prospect of spending the holidays with them, it is supposed that he was to have sailed in the steamer Ohio, which left New Orleans for New York a few hours after his death. So suddenly and mysteriously are the plans of men frustrated.

Mr. Stillman was widely known as a skillful mechanic and successful inventor. The "Patent Clarifier," used in the manufacture of sugar, was his invention; and he made important improvements in the mill for extracting the juice from the sugar cane, and in what is called the Vacuum Pan. He also invented an apparatus to prevent the explosion of steam boilers, called the Safety Fuse, which consists of a fusible plug attached to a tube, and so arranged in the boiler that the moment the water becomes too low, the plug melts, and steam escapes through the tube to give warning of danger—a safeguard which is in use on all the Pacific Mail Steamers and on Collins' Line of Atlantic Steamers.

Mr. Stillman was a devoted Christian. In early life he made a public profession of religion, and it was observed by those who were intimate with him, that his religion was not a mere theory. His desire to honor God in his family, the fervor of his prayers in the social meeting, the earnestness with which he addressed his brethren on such occasions, the zeal with which he devoted himself to works of benevolence, and his anxiety for the spread of divine truth, all attest the strong hold which the religion of the Gospel had upon his affections. His death has deprived the Seventh-day Baptist Church in New York of one of its best members.

Death of Mr. Alfred Stillman.

At a meeting of the Foremen, Draughtsmen and Clerks of the Novelty Iron Works, held pursuant to call, on Thursday evening, Dec. 19, 1850, the following resolutions were adopted:—

Resolved, That in the sudden and violent death of Mr. Alfred Stillman, we humbly acknowledge the hand of an inscrutable Providence, overruling all events to the advancement of his own glory.

Resolved, That while we submissively bow to this afflictive stroke, as being ordered by that wisdom which is from above, we deeply deplore in his death the loss of one who, by his interest for our individual welfare, his untiring industry and ability in mechanical operations, his universal benevolence and suavity of manners, and his unswerving integrity and principles, has won our highest respect and esteem.

Resolved, That we hereby offer our sincere condolence to his bereaved family, who in this calamitous affliction are suddenly deprived of the anticipation of soon embracing an affectionate and devoted husband, an instructive and indulgent father, and a firm and faithful protect[illegible] for all of which we now earnestly co[illegible]em to Him who has promised to be the God of the fatherless and the widow.

Resolved, That in this bereavement we recognize the severance of those endearing ties which bind together the hearts of parents and children—of brothers and sisters; and while we sympathize with these relatives in their loss, we would point them to where a mother's prayers have received their highest consummation, and to those comforting words, "Blessed are the dead that die in the Lord."
